

About This Book

Ballet in America has come of age. And George Amberg, Theatre Arts Consultant at the Museum of Modern Art, Lecturer in the Arts at New York University, author of Art in Modern Ballet, has documented and analyzed its growth and development. His book is unique, not only as a history of ballet in America from the early days of theatrical dancing to the present, but also as a penetrating study in American culture and art.

"This book," says Dr. Amberg, "is a record of the ballet in America. Its essential purpose is to bring together material that has not been available before; its basic premise is that the ballet has become American. (This) means that our ballet artists have proved complete artistic authority and full control of the medium. It also means that our ballet is a true reflection of our time and place, of our social and aesthetic climate. Our ballet is American in the sense that it has become an expression of the creativeness of our country."

Although Dr. Amberg touches upon the first American dancers of note, upon Pavlova's conquest of America, upon the American work of such figures as Mordkin, Nijinsky, Fokine, Massine and Bolm, his emphasis is on the recent years during which the ballet has gained its specific American character. Dr. Amberg discusses fully the work of Antony Tudor, Jerome Robbins, Agnes de Mille, Michael Kidd, Balanchine, Lincoln Kirstein and other outstanding figures in modern American ballet. He effectively combines detailed synopses with critiques of significant American ballets, seeing ballet as a synthesis of dancing, music and scenic art. Reader and dancer alike will find his analysis and interpretation brilliantly illuminating.

Ballet contains a number of other unusual features: two original ballet libretti—Fancy Free by Jerome Robbins and Laurie Makes Up Her Mind (from Oklahoma!) by Agnes de Mille; a complete listing of the repertoires of the important companies; a chronology of 150 years of American ballet; and an unusual selection of ballet photographs. In this popular edition, Ballet should be the

Some MENTOR BOOKS of Interest—35c

ARTS AND THE MAN by Irwin Edman (#M40)

MUSIC FOR THE MILLIONS (abridged)
by David Ewen (#M47)

THE GREEK WAY TO WESTERN CIVILIZATION
by Edith Hamilton (#M32)

BEETHOVEN by J. W. N. Sullivan (#M15)

HOW TO KNOW AMERICAN ANTIQUES
by Alice Winchester (#M62)

INTRODUCING SHAKESPEARE by G. B. Harrison (#M14)

BALLET

(Original title: Ballet in America)

THE EMERGENCE OF AN AMERICAN ART

With selected illustrations from the higher-priced edition

by George Amberg

A MENTOR BOOK

Published by THE NEW AMERICAN LIBRARY

Contents

INTRODUCTION	vii
1. The Nineteenth Century	15
2. The Imperial Pioneers— Pavlova and Mordkin	21
3. Diaghilev in America	28
4. The Ballet Russe I— The Diaghilev Succession	38
5. The Ballet Russe II— Massine's Ballet Russe	45
6. The Ballet Russe III— The Americanization	55
7. Three American Pioneers	69
8. Lincoln Kirstein I— The Foundations	76
9. Lincoln Kirstein II— The Performance	85
10. The Ballet Theatre I— Antony Tudor and Agnes de Mille	94
11. The Ballet Theatre II— Jerome Robbins and Michael Kidd	121
12. The Ballet Theatre III— The Achievement	145
13. The Dance Players— The Ballet International	159
14. The Musical Comedy	167
CHRONOLOGY	176
BALLET REPERTORIES	196
INDEX	222

Illustrations

(See Picture Section)

ANNA PAVLOVA in The Dying Swan, 1910

VASLAV NIJINSKY in Petrouchka. 1911. Photo: Elliott & Fry, London

ALEXANDRA DANILOVA in Mozartiana, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1933

LEONIDE MASSINE and NINI THEILADE in Nobilissima Visione. Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1938

WILLIAM DOLLAR in Ballet Imperial, The American Ballet, 1941. Photo: George Platt Lynes

Group from Rodeo, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1942.
Photo: Fred FehI

Group from Frankie and Johnny, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1945

Group from Virginia Sampler, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1947. Photo: Fred FehI

Group from Billy the Kid, American Ballet Caravan, 1938.
Photo: George Platt Lynes

ALICIA MARKOVA. Photo: Maurice Seymour

Group from Pillar of Fire. Ballet Theatre, 1942

ALICIA ALONSO and ANTONY TUDOR in Lilac Garden, Ballet Theatre, 1940

HUGH LAING and NORA KAYE in Pillar of Fire, Ballet Theatre, 1942. Photo: Alfredo Valente

NANA GOLLNER and HUGH LAING in Undertow, Ballet Theatre, 1945

Group from Interplay, Ballet Theatre, 1945

Group from Fancy Free. Ballet Theatre, 1944

Group from Tally-Ho, Ballet Theatre, 1944. Photo: Fred FehI

CIVIL WAR BALLET in Bloomer Girl, 1944. Photo: Eileen Darby, Graphic House

IGOR YOUSKEVITCH. Photo: Alfredo Valente

FREDERIC FRANKLIN in Baiser de la Fée, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Photo: Fred FehI

JOHN KRIZA and MELISSA HAYDEN in Interplay, Ballet Theatre. Photo: Alfredo Valente

Introduction

Two years ago, when the project of a survey of the ballet in America was first discussed, neither expert nor layman, neither author nor publishers could predict the result with any amount of certainty. It was simply evident that there was a real need for such a study. The growing enthusiasm for the ballet in this country had created a substantial new audience and a steadily increasing demand for handy information and permanent reference material.

This book was begun as an attempt to fill that demand, but after preliminary examination it became apparent that the task was considerably wider in scope and infinitely more complex than the original plan suggested. As the data accumulated, the sober reference book grew into the discussion of a new art and a new aesthetic. In order to appreciate the admirable achievements of our contemporary ballet, it is necessary to evaluate it, not as the product of circumstances, but as the valid expression of a specific time and a specific country—that is, as an emerging American art.

This book, then, is a record of the ballet in America. Its essential purpose is to bring together material that has not been available before; its basic premise is that the ballet has become an American art.

The last statement may be interpreted in several ways. In the first place, it means that our ballet artists have proved complete artistic authority and full control of the medium. It also means that our ballet is a true reflection of our time and place, of our social and aesthetic climate. Of course, the artistic ballet is not defined by its geographical origin; it is totally relevant whether its exponents are literally citizens of the United States. Our ballet is American in the sense that it has become an expression of the creativeness of our country. In other words, it is, for instance, our writing.

The artistic progress of the ballet in America has been fast, steady and extensive. While there has been some form of ballet in America for more than a century and a half, the national American ballet is barely fifteen years old. It appeared, almost without transition, in immediate response to the powerful stimulus of the Ballet Russe and as the result of expert training in the classical idiom offered by outstanding Russian teachers.

opened and been consolidated. Recent attendance throughout the country have exceeded an estimated million and a half, not counting the enormous audience of the musical comedy.

Actually the audience had been prepared over the years; irregular intervals, visiting guests and foreign touring companies had slowly acquainted the American public with the ballet. But not until 1933, when the Ballet Russe presented its first season of repertory, was there any regular, continuous performance by a large-sized company of some prestige. At about the same time the first modest resident companies were established and the first American-born and -trained dancers and choreographers made a tentative appearance. Since then a whole new generation of ballet artists has reached artistic maturity.

The process of formation, clarification and articulation that went on during the past fifteen years resulted in the American ballet. This does not refer to any particular company or composition, but rather to a generic character. While it may be too early to identify the essential trends in the American ballet in terms of style, there is clear evidence of a specific American nature or quality in thought, feeling and expression. The first home-made ballets of the thirties tended, somewhat self-consciously, to stress and exaggerate their American character in the choice of plot and subject matter, in the crowding with native traits and types, in the deliberate use of local associations and vernacular and, most of all, in the employment of native writers, composers and designers, choreographers and dancers.

But probably the most important result of the forceful native demonstration of the thirties was the realization that the American ballet still had a way to go. The young artists had made an admirable and successful start; they had formulated their hopes and expectations well and they had put in their claim. But the avant-garde American ballet needed both more money and infinitely more experience in order to meet the exacting standards of the European professional ballet on its own level. It ought to be remembered, of course, that the mild rebellion of the ballet pioneers was primarily directed against the imposition of foreign aesthetic conventions and what Lincoln Kirstein called the "spectral blackmail" of a worn repertory formula, and not against the basic principles of the traditional ballet. No radical disagreement prevented American dancers and choreographers, composers and designers, from cooperating with the "Russian" ballet whenever they were offered the chance.

Like painting or music, the ballet has the composite charac-

INTRODUCTION

a stage and the turn-out practically eliminates foreshortening and exhibits the whole figure in full frontal view. The five positions of the feet are supplemented by less rigid, but equally logical positions of the head and arms. Visually the most striking characteristic of the ballet is the dancing on the toes, habitually reserved to the female performer. It is not a technical stunt but a means to convey an impression of weightless, floating movement. Although there are different schools, mainly French, Italian and Russian, these basic principles are universally recognized, and constitute an international language of the ballet.

This language is an accepted convention, used by the choreographer in the creation of a ballet in the same way that counterpoint in music or perspective in painting are useful conventional means toward the achievement of imaginative ends. Choreography, literally meaning dance notation, is actually the art of dance composition in both the mechanical and the creative sense. Although the ballet is essentially dance, it employs music and scenic art as legitimate associates and the choreographic concept of the completed composition is a synthesis of the three arts.

It is certain that the contemporary American ballet owes its prodigious growth, its solid reputation and its immense popularity to the situation created by the war. Isolated from the rest of the world, entirely reduced to its own sources and resources, our ballet was suddenly submitted to a decisive test. Fortunately, that occurred almost precisely at the moment when our native choreographers were just old enough and experienced enough to meet the challenge. (The active presence of George Balanchine, inexhaustibly inventive, was nothing less than providential.) Toward the end of the war it had become obvious that the critical and exacting task of preserving the ballet had turned into a triumph for the younger ballet generation. They had never danced better, they had never looked fresher and lovelier, they had never displayed greater verve and brilliance. The intervening years have more than confirmed the belief that this wonderful impetus was not accidental, but the logical result of hard work and consistent endeavor.

Economically speaking, the ballet has developed into an important branch of the entertainment business, and the volume of financial transactions involved now runs into staggering figures. But since the flow of easy wartime money is coming to an end, certain symptoms of a crisis and of a possible business recession are causing some alarm. Indeed, if those potential dangers were ever to become acute, they would not only seriously upset the precarious financial balance of the ballet budgets, but they would also affect the very existence of the qualified dancers, the expert staff and the whole industry associated with ballet production. Unfortunately, these considerations have a direct bearing on the professional standard and the artistic policy of the ballet companies and they indicate the basic weakness of the whole ballet situation: financial insecurity. No survey of the ballet would be complete or accurate without an objective appreciation of the perennial conflict between idealistic artistic planning and realistic commercial management.

INTRODUCTION

Several events in the American ballet have occurred too late to be described and fully evaluated in this book. Yet they are sufficiently important to be mentioned here. The most serious fact is that Ballet Theatre was compelled temporarily to suspend its activity for lack of funds. Reorganized early in 1949, the company is still admirably strong, although Alicia Alonso and some of its former leading soloists did not return, and a new corps de ballet had to be rehearsed in a complete repertory. Nana Gollner and Janet Reed rejoined the company, and Maria Tallchief was engaged as ballerina.

While Ballet Theatre was in difficulties, the City of New York invited a foreign company, the Paris Opera Ballet, to perform as part of the New York Anniversary celebration. This ill-advised and unfortunate decision caused some bitter comment and resentment for which neither the guest company, nor the American dancers can be held responsible.

Ballet Theatre's former ballerina, Alicia Alonso, proved her courage and initiative by organizing her own company in her native Havana. The new group is largely composed of former Ballet Theatre artists, with Alicia Alonso as prima ballerina, Igor Youskevitch as premier danseur, Fernando Alonso as general director, Alberto Alonso as artistic director, Max Goberman and Ben Steinberg as conductors. The ensemble is small, the repertory is yet modest; scenery and costumes are borrowed; the touring schedule is limited, but talent and spirit are there and the prospects are promising.

Ballet Society has successfully completed its second season and has made good on its promises and stated policy. Although the essential character, and the inevitable weaknesses of a student company are still noticeable, the standard of performance is in general highly creditable. The ensemble is fast improving in coherence, skill and experience, and the soloists are excepmany seasons, and in itself would be enough of an accomplishment to justify the existence of the Ballet Society. It is a theatre work of compelling grandeur, magic and beauty, with a magnificent score by Stravinsky, a fully congenial choreography by George Balanchine and an extraordinary décor by Isamu Noguchi, all integrated to perfection.

INTRODUCTION

Without sacrificing its original function and purpose, the Ballet Society has become the official New York City Ballet Company, regularly performing twice a week. This may turn out to be an important step toward the consolidation of the ballet and the eventual establishment of a permanent resident company in New York.

Several noteworthy novelties were presented—Ruth Page's Billy Sunday and Ruthanna Boris's Quelques Fleurs at the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo; Agnes de Mille's Fall River Legend and Antony Tudor's Shadow of the Wind at the Ballet Theatre; George Balanchine's Divertimento, The Triumph of Bacchus and Ariadne, Symphony in C (Bizet), Symphonie Concertante (Mozart) and Orpheus, and Todd Bolender's Mother Goose Suite at the Ballet Society.

Although conscientious efforts have been made to furnish proof and facts and accurate data in this analysis, it is obvious that criticism involves matters of personal taste. No apology need be offered to those who disagree, because this survey does not pretend to be final or conclusive. Its main claim to validity is the circumstance that it coincides with a decisive period in the evolution of the American ballet.

The records of ballet are vague and fragmentary. Even where modern means of recording—dance script, photography and film—have been used, the result is, at best, an approximation. Our ballets are precariously preserved in the memory of executants and witnesses, subject to unconscious errors and failings and the changing tastes of times. While future historians may speak with greater authority, they will also be reduced to second-hand information and speculation. Our opportunity of checking and rechecking our impressions against those of the critics who saw, and the dancers who performed, makes the evidence more authentic and we hope the freshness and immediacy of an eye-witness report will compensate for what may appear, in years to come, possible lack of perspective.

Research in the field of the American ballet is discouraging. Except for occasional articles in various periodicals, there is very little published literature on the ballet in America and no bibliography of even those meager sources. By far the largest collection of scholarly research is contained in the six volumes of Dance Index, a periodical founded by Lincoln Kirstein in 1942, and directed under his guidance by various competent editors. This work contains several indispensable studies of high scholarly standing and impeccable accuracy. The Book of the Dance by Lincoln Kirstein (New York, 1942) contains an appended condensation of dancing in North America from 1519 to 1942. The Borzoi Book of Ballets by Grace Robert (New York, 1946) includes a brief summary of the ballet in the United States. Theatrical Dancing in America by Winthrop Palmer (New York, 1945) does not offer what the title promises. For data on choreographers and ballets, Cyril W. Beaumont's Complete Book of Ballets (London, 1937; New York, 1941) with Supplement to Complete Book of Ballets (London, 1942) still remains the standard work of reference, but his information on American personalities and recent performances is fragmentary.

The main source of data for this book consisted of programs, souvenir albums, press releases, announcements, posters and similar ephemera. These are elusive and unreliable documents, not only because of careless printing and editing and the stylizations of imaginative press agents, but also because of the inexplicable custom of giving every conceivable information but the year. The search in the offices and archives of ballet organizations was distressingly unprofitable. The most comprehensive specialized collection of dance material of every description is accumulated in the Dance Archives, a section of the Theatre Arts Department of the Museum of Modern Art in New York. The second large body of collected information consulted extensively was the daily press and periodical literature. Although dance criticism, in the strict sense of the word, is fairly recent, important and sensational ballet news has had some kind of press coverage for many years.

The greater part of this book is based on personal experience gained in seeing the ballet and in conversations with ballet artists and experts. I am deeply grateful to all of these artists and experts for inspiration and actual advice and assistance. Their interest and confidence has been a source of continual encouragement and stimulation during the long time of preparation and writing. Besides the many who have contributed, often unwittingly, to the making of this book, I wish to thank in particular the following who have gracefully submitted to time-consuming interviews: George Balanchine, Valerie Bettis, Todd Bolender, Lucia Chase, Anatole Chujoy, Marquis George de Cuevas, Agnes de Mille, Sergei J. Denham, Sol Hurok, Michael Kidd, Lincoln Kirstein, Ruth Page, Richard Pleasant, Jerome Robbins, Cecil Smith, Anna Sokolow, Walter Terry and Antony Tudor.

INTRODUCTION

Grateful acknowledgment for help and cooperation in securing material and information is made to Walter Alford, Kathleen Harding, Margaret Hornyak-Ince, Barry Hyams, Arthur Kantor, Michael Mordkin, Jr., Dorothy Norman and to Miss Marian Hannah Winter, who is preparing a comprehensive work on the earlier history of the American dance.

I feel especially indebted to the ballet photographers whose splendid work contributes immeasurably to this book: Larry Colwell, Fred Fehl, Fritz Henle, Earl Leaf, Walter Owen, George Platt-Lynes, Maurice Seymour, Alfredo Valente, Carl Van Vechten and Eileen Darby of Graphic House.

I wish to express particular thanks to Merle Armitage, for his permission to quote from his book Dance Memoranda; to Edwin Denby, for his unusual generosity in permitting me to quote freely from his articles and from an unpublished essay on the American ballet; to Lincoln Kirstein, for having approved in advance the chapter on his work and for his additional kindness in contributing a specially written statement; to John Martin, for valuable suggestions and for his generous authorization to quote from his writings and reviews; and in particular to Agnes de Mille, for permission to print the original scenario for an Oklahoma! ballet, and to Jerome Robbins, for contributing the manuscript for the ballet Fancy Free.

To Eloise Fiorelli and Allegra Fuller I owe sincere gratitude for the painstaking care they have given to difficult research; and to Naomi Horowitz for tactful and competent editing. My wife, Gisela, has devotedly attended to the more tedious detail connected with the preparation, and it is largely owing to her assistance and cooperation that I was able to accomplish so vast a job in spare hours.

But the greatest European visitor of the century was the famous Fanny Elssler. She arrived in America in 1840, accompanied by her manager, Henry Wickoff, her cousin, a young dancer, and James Sylvain, her partner and ballet master, and made her début in May at the Park Theatre in New York in the divertissement La Cracovienne and the ballet La Tarantule. In a letter of doubtful authenticity but credible accuracy she describes her reception at the opening:

The whole house rose and such a shout ascended as stunned my senses and made me involuntarily recoil. Men waved their hats and women their handkerchiefs and all was inexplicable dumb show for several mortal moments. Order at length restored, the dance began. I danced without effort and even Katty [her cousin] applauded some of my feats. The most deafening exclamations of delight broke at rapid intervals from all parts of the house, till they lashed themselves into a perfect tempest of admiration. Never before did I behold so vast an assembly so completely under the sway of one dominant feeling and so entirely abandoned to its inspiration. The curtain fell amid a roar that sounded like the fall of mighty waters and that soon brought me before them. Their applause was perfectly frantic, cheers and bravos saluted me and flowers and wreaths fell like rain upon me.

Wherever Elssler appeared she gained an audience, not only for herself, but simultaneously for the beauty and perfection of classic ballet. It was not an easy undertaking for a ballerina used to all the facilities of the great theatres in the European capitals. In many places the stages were inadequate, the orchestras mediocre, the audience uninitiated and no trained corps de ballet was available. In spite of all these difficulties, Elssler's tours through America and to Havana met everywhere with the same prodigious success. She was so satisfied with America that she postponed her return to the Paris Opera several times and eventually forfeited her contract. She toured America for two years, leaving in July 1842.

The success of European dancers, although it did not create a dance tradition, stimulated American talent and during the nineteenth century America produced four ballet dancers of note—Mary Ann Lee, Julia Turnbull, Augusta Maywood and George Washington Smith; Miss Maywood achieved international fame. She and Mary Ann Lee received expert training in the classical ballet from P. H. Hazard of the Paris Opera, who taught in Philadelphia, and who was probably also George Washington Smith's teacher.

Maywood and Lee made a joint début as child stars in Philadelphia in 1837 and there was some rivalry between them which ended when Miss Maywood left to look for triumphs in well educated by her stepfather, Robert Campbell Maywood. A year after her Philadelphia début with Mary Ann Lee, she made her first New York appearance and received as enthusiastic a reception as she had in Philadelphia. Mr. Maywood took his family to Paris in 1838—and Augusta studied with Mazillier and Corally, making prodigious progress. Just before her début at the Paris Opera, Théophile Gautier wrote: "Mlle Augusta Maywood has a very sharp kind of talent; it is neither the melancholy grace nor the dreamy abandon of Mlle Grahn who reflects in her clear cold blue eyes the skies of Norway and seems to be a Valkyrie dancing on snow. It is even less the inimitable perfection of Fanny Elssler. There is something abrupt, unexpected, something bizarre which sets this dancer quite apart." Her début in 1839 was conspicuously successful; but she compromised her career by her elopement with the dancer, Charles Mabile.

This marriage was the gossip of the day and was amply commented upon in the American press. Robert Maywood went back home but Augusta never returned to America. She refused to stay in Paris and accepted an engagement in Lisbon. Her début there in Giselle was greeted with ovations and she was reengaged for the 1844-1845 season. During that time there were unpleasant rumors concerning her private life. However, she was engaged at the Hofburg in Vienna as prima ballerina, together with her husband, who became solo dancer; they separated there. In 1848 she participated in a fabulous season at La Scala in Milan, appearing with some of the greatest choreographers and dancers of the period. Although she received tempting offers, she decided to organize her own independent touring company, a venture which Marian Winter calls "the pioneer effort of its type." Her company included star dancers and a whole ensemble; before Maywood, when a dancer toured, she found her corps de ballet and even the solo dancers where she could. Augusta Maywood's fame and success remained undiminished until her retirement about 1862. During her life she did not, properly speaking, contribute to the development of the ballet in America; Fanny Elssler, indeed, did more. The Americans of her time never condoned her private life, although they knew little about it with any accuracy. Her contemporaries never realized and our contemporaries have forgotten that in her America gave the world one of its great dancers.

Lillian Moore, the well-known dancer and dance scholar, says of George Washington Smith, "He seems to have been our only native premier danseur noble." His early career, like that of Maywood and Lee, is connected with Philadelphia, where terprising man had the libretto for a melodrama, The Black Crook, which was rewritten and revised for the occasion. The completed spectacle was the most extravagant America had yet seen. Its effect on production techniques and theatrical dancing was lasting. The Black Crook established the genre. It was followed by many similar spectacles, although none was quite as successful as the original.

For all their naïve taste, the ballet interludes presented fine, professional dancing and the Italian ballerinas, Maria Bonfanti and Rita Sangalli, were excellent artists. The company included Betty Rigi and Rose Delval, the principal dancers, thirty-five children, a corps de ballet of thirty-nine American and twenty-three English girls, three premières and nine solo dancers. Daniel Costa was ballet master. As the success lasted new ballerinas and dancers were imported from abroad. This influx of well-trained dancers brought good talent and good teachers into the country and, if the production was not of the highest artistic order or the surest taste, it was nevertheless clean and competent.

This brief history conveys at least one salient fact: there was no continuous development, no sustained tradition, in the American ballet during the nineteenth century. In Europe, the ballet was a venerated art and a formal institution, affiliated with permanent opera companies, amply supported by official or private means and assured of a supply of well-trained dancers from their schools. In America the ballet was entirely left to private initiative, to enterprising impresarios or theatre owners or to the choreographers and dancers themselves. There was little opportunity for aspiring artists to study classic dancing and even less to see good performances. It is all the more admirable that dancers like John Durang, Julia Turnbull, Augusta Maywood, Mary Ann Lee and George Washington Smith achieved the stature they did, but it is sad to reflect that their magnificent efforts and accomplishments were almost totally lost because there was no succession, no provision for handing them on from one generation to another in a perpetual progress of tradition.

great composers through the most primitive and yet potent of mediums—motion!”

The author continues: “Pavlova and Mordkin’s performances give a suggestion, nothing more, of an art old and thoroughly established in Russia, but new to the rest of the world. It is the unfolding or enactment of a narrative—drama, opera, or call it what you may—through Terpsichore. Not a line is spoken, not a word sung. Only the graceful movements of the ballet and the rhythmic sway of the character dancers, supplemented by music especially written for the purpose illuminate the theme, or plot. Yet it is all perfectly understandable to Slav or Saxon, Greek or Gaul—to all who have eyes to see—for each story is interpreted in the great universal language, the poetry of action.” It sounds like a difficult task for Terpsichore and it reads like a masterpiece of ignorance.

Mordkin described this strenuous tour in his memoirs as “a nightmare.” The company presented from eight to eleven performances weekly, as against the customary two in the Imperial Ballets. Pioneering ballet in America was not easy. The strain of endless traveling and rehearsing was immense and the aesthetic inertia of the provincial public required extraordinary efforts at persuasion.

Their second season was successful, but Pavlova and Mordkin separated at the end of it and their careers and influence must be traced separately.

In evaluating Pavlova’s significance for the American ballet two aspects stand out: the intangible quality, the legend, and the fact that from 1913 to 1925 hers was the only ballet organization regularly touring the country. Her productions as a whole would by no means live up to our present standards and the parts she reserved for herself were certainly not of equally inspired invention. Anna Pavlova is generally called “the greatest” dancer of our century but the truth is that she never allowed herself to be challenged as a mature artist. She generally avoided risking or exhausting her powers in parts of a large scope and she would not tolerate rivalry on the stage. There was no second ballerina of stature in her company and she changed her male partners whenever they threatened to become too successful in their own right—hence the long list of “former partners,” including such distinguished names as Adolph Bolm, Mikhail Mordkin, Laurent Novikoff and Alexandre Volinine. However, she was fully entitled to choose her premier danseur and her whole ensemble as for she owned the company which she maintained and for which she assumed sole responsibility. ] extensive Pavlova literature. Unlike Isadora Duncan or Ruth St. Denis she had no message to carry on her grinding tours year in and year out. Rather she was the performing artist par excellence. Her off-stage existence, the iron discipline and ceaseless work of her whole private life, was but one long, extended preparation for the exquisite, ephemeral moments of the performance. She did not exhibit technical feats of prodigious virtuosity, but relied on the soundness and solidity of the traditional school. Her balance was phenomenal. But no technical analysis would yield the secret of her incomparable art, the exquisiteness and elegance of her line, the lyric grace and flow of her movement and the ultimate perfection of imperishable beauty, which are at the heart of her legend.

Mordkin's reception at his début here with Pavlova was as enthusiastic as hers. Before his appearance male dancers had not been very highly regarded in America and his success was not only an appreciation of his art but was also the triumph of the virile athlete, the "Greek God," whose muscular endurance and well-trained physique were discussed in terms of track and field experience: "His endurance would have put to shame many a university or college distance runner."

After his split with Pavlova, Mordkin was engaged for a third season. For this tour, as its choreographic director and organizer, he provided a select All Star Imperial Russian Ballet with Ekaterina Geltzer, Julia Sedowa, Lydia Sokolova, Alexandre Volinine and Bronislava Pajitskaya as the leading soloists. The repertory consisted of a selection of divertissements and the "ocular operas," Swan Lake, Coppelia, Giselle, The Seasons and The Legend of Azyade. The two Pavlova-Mordkin seasons and this third season were the only performances of the Imperial Russian Ballet ever to reach America and since then there have been no further direct contacts with the Imperial Russian tradition. (The Diaghilev school is a mixture of strictly traditional training and Franco-Russian performing style.) But Mordkin, himself a great representative of the Imperial tradition, became established here as a teacher.

He was born in Moscow in 1881 and was graduated from the Imperial Ballet school; he distinguished himself early and soon reached the rank of premier danseur classique. In 1909 he joined the Diaghilev company in Paris during its first season and appeared prominently in guest performances in many European capitals, while keeping his position as first dancer and ballet master of the Bolshoy Theatre in Moscow. From 1913 to 1917 he collaborated and experimented with Alexander Tairoff at the Kamerny Theatre and with Constantin Stanislavsky at the Moscow Art Theatre. During the civil war he escaped into the Caucasus but he returned to Moscow in 1922 where he was appointed Director of Ballet at the State Academy Theatre, the former Imperial Theatre. He found his position untenable under the new regime and after an extended Russian tour he accepted an invitation from the impresario, Morris Gest, to come to America in 1923. For two seasons he toured the United States with a Russian ballet, including Vera Nemtchinova, Hilda Butsova, Xenia Maletsova and Pierre Vladimiroff as soloists. Mordkin was respectfully acclaimed for his stage presence and artistic authority, but his success did not nearly resemble his former triumphs at the Metropolitan; Nemtchinova was the star of the company. At the end of this tour Mordkin established his School of the Dance in New York and devoted himself to teaching.

Mordkin had scored his brilliant success within the old established Imperial tradition; in Tsarist Russia he had been considered a courageous and advanced artist. His characterization of an Italian beggar boy, with turned-in feet, once shocked every ballet conservative, as he related himself. But Fokine, Nijinsky and Massine had been infinitely more radical and imaginative—and more successful—in their reforms. After the work of Diaghilev and his collaborators, the standards of ballet performance in Western Europe and hence in America, too, were no longer dictated from the Marinsky and Bolshoy Theatres, but from Paris and the Côte d'Azur. Mordkin, like so many others who believed in the essential superiority of the Imperial tradition, had missed or disregarded, if not objected to, the evolution of the modern ballet outside Russia.

Without an appreciation of these circumstances it is impossible to be fair in evaluating Mordkin's contribution to the American ballet, which was considerable. Inside Russia he had been able to pursue his creative experiments which led to the mimo-drama productions at the Kamerny Theatre, the establishment of the school of plastique and rhythmique at the Moscow Art Theatre and culminated in the grandiose production of Azyade in the Nikitin Circus in 1918. In America all these accomplishments were unknown. His prestige here was based on his stage successes as a dancer a decade before. Naturally he was no longer a "pagan God" who would excite a bourgeois audience "with his titanic manhood." He was a mature artist, possessing vast choreographic and performing experience, but he had no organized ballet company to work with and there was no theatrical avant-garde to encourage and support theatrical experimentation. Hence Mordkin concentrated all his efforts on his school, and soon acquired a reputation. After ten years of consistent work with young Americans, he had trained and developed enough talent to organize a producing company, the Mordkin Ballet. It opened at the Majestic Theatre in New York in the autumn of 1937.

It had been preceded by a small venture, a presentation of the Mikhail Mordkin Ballet, an "All-American" ballet, consisting of advanced students, including Lucia Chase and Viola Essen. For the 1937-1938 season the student company was expanded; Lucia Chase was promoted to the rank of prima ballerina and Leon Varkas and Dimitri Romanoff, two experienced young dancers, were engaged as male soloists. The program presented Giselle and a new ballet, The Goldfish, with music by Nicolai Tcherepnine and décor and costumes by Sergei Soudeikine. The tentative season was so successful, both in New York and on tour, that several new dancers were engaged, among them Karen Conrad, Katherine Sergava and Nina Stroganova. La Fille Mal Gardée and an original Mordkin ballet, Dionysius, with music by Glazounov, décor and costumes by Soudeikine, were added to the repertory. In November 1938 the new Mordkin Ballet, now a full-sized company, appeared at the Alvin Theatre, presenting a new version of Swan Lake and two new works by Mordkin, Voices of Spring, with music by Johann Strauss and décor by Lee Simonson, and Trepak, with music by Tcherepnine, setting and costumes by Soudeikine. Patricia Bowman replaced Lucia Chase as prima ballerina and Edward Caton, Vladimir Dokoudovsky and Kari Karnakoski were added as soloists.

This brave venture did not survive for several reasons. A permanent company needs much greater funds for preparation and promotion than Mordkin had at his disposal. It was also too small, with its limited repertory and modest production facilities, to compete with the brilliant performances the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo was giving at the Metropolitan. During the 1938-1939 season, which was Mordkin's last, the Ballet Russe presented Danilova, Markova, Toumanova, Slavenska and Massine, Youskevitch and Franklin, while Mordkin's dancers were comparatively unknown. Although there were fine, promising talents in his company, they were, with few exceptions, not stage-experienced artists and seasoned performers; the Mordkin Ballet had no dancer of true ballerina stature as the exponent of the classical repertory. It had, besides, immediately compromised on the "All-American" principle, which weakened the justification for another resident company.

Mordkin's general artistic policy, as demonstrated in his repertory and artistic collaboration was conventional in every way. Sergei Soudeikine, his chief stage designer, had great experience and genuine personality; as a painter he was reminiscent of the prewar Russian school Diaghilev had introduced to Western Europe thirty years before, but he lacked the boldness of Roerich, the talent of Bakst or the style of Benois. Essentially the Mordkin Ballet was Russian ballet in retrospect, already dated at its inception. Nevertheless it was a worthy and probably a necessary effort, since the American ballet has grown by trial and error. Nor was Mordkin's effort wasted. His company formed the nucleus of the Ballet Theatre, and Voices of Spring figured for a while in its repertory. Mordkin collaborated briefly as a choreographer with that organization; after that he devoted most of his time and energies to his school.

3

Diaghilev in America

LIKE PAVLOVA, Diaghilev has become a legend. Although he moved all his life in a deliberately confined, carefully select circle of collaborators and intimates and addressed a limited audience of sophisticates, although he himself was not a creative or performing artist, although he never established a home or a school or provided for any succession, his work has left him a monument of world-wide fame.

His greatness lay, first, in his capacity for visualizing the final synthesis of all the elements in a production and, second, in his flair for bringing out creative talent to realize his vision. He was wise enough to call on almost any artist of stature within the orbit of the unique artists' group in Paris during the period from 1909 to 1929, whether he was a choreographer, composer, writer, painter or merely a source of stimulation. And every ballet in Diaghilev's repertory manifested the same balanced collaboration within its respective genre, the same unity of vision. As Lincoln Kirstein, in a lucid and penetrating essay on Diaghilev and his period, pointed out, he "created a taste in and of his own period, he set up the only referable standards of aesthetic excellence in the first quarter of the century and provided the only great market for a unified creative endeavor."

The formal perfection the ballet had achieved under Petipa at the Marinsky Theatre had reached its limits. Every ballet was composed according to the unalterable formula of five acts, prologue and epilogue. The story was practically irrelevant and had no consistent dramatic structure. The ballerina reigned supreme, the male dancer was less important and the corps de ballet was merely decorative. Settings and costumes were rigorously prescribed.

In the unity of conception of his ballets, the brilliant integration of music, design and expressive dancing and in the use of advanced art, music and subject matter lay the daring of the Diaghilev reforms. The first season of Diaghilev's Ballets Russes was presented in Paris in the summer of 1909 with some of the younger artists of the Imperial Ballet and from then it was only a matter of time until Diaghilev's methods were known and accepted on both sides of the Atlantic.

In the summer of 1911, five years before Diaghilev came to America, Gertrude Hoffman, a well-known American vaudeville dancer and impresario, turned impresario and launched a "Saison de Ballets Russes" at the Winter Garden in New York. Her company of about a hundred imported artists included such outstanding dancers as Lydia Lopokova, Theodore and Alexis Kosloff, Alexis Bulgakov and Alexandre Volinine, and her repertory listed Opéra de Paris, Scheherazade and Les Sylphides, taken from Diaghilev without credit to their choreographer, Fokine, or their designer, Bakst, restored from memory by Miss Hoffman and Theodore Kosloff. Their success was sensational; the soloists, in particular Lopokova—conquered both audience and critics. But the subsequent tour was less successful; Lopokova and Volinine left to join Mordkin's company and the whole venture broke down.

Diaghilev himself came to America in 1916 and then only because the world war left him almost no other choice. He had taken refuge in Switzerland in 1915, his funds exhausted, his company disbanded, his audience scattered. At the same time the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York decided, for patriotic reasons, to replace its entire German repertory and its contingent of German artists, including the ballet. The negotiations for an American tour of the Diaghilev Ballet under the auspices of the Metropolitan Opera Company were primarily a matter of expediency for both parties. Diaghilev accepted the offer with bad grace, although it saved his company; Giulio Gatti-Casazza, the General Manager of the Metropolitan, was indifferent to the ballet in general and hostile to Diaghilev. The Metropolitan had a resident ballet company of its own; to protect it from the competition of the Diaghilev company, a subsidiary organization, the Metropolitan Ballet Company, Inc., was formed for the Diaghilev tour, and the management of the Diaghilev company was entrusted to the Metropolitan Music Bureau. In effect, the Metropolitan lent its name and house and withheld its active sympathy and cooperation. The real driving force and the principal backer of the enterprise was Otto H. Kahn, who, as Lincoln Kirstein says, has been "one of our entirely disinterested and understanding patrons of every sort of creative expression from opera to poetry."

From the beginning to the end, the Diaghilev venture was characterized by personal friction, misunderstandings and outright hostility. Diaghilev was at fault as well as his antagonists; he was frequently arrogant, irritating and unreasonable. At the basic misunderstanding was the American organization's accountable assumption that Diaghilev would be sold to reassemble his original company. Actually he arrived without his greatest choreographer, Fokine, and his two star dancers Nijinsky and Karsavina. Karsavina was dancing in London and had refused to join the American tour; she was replaced by Lydia Lopokova and Flore Revalles. Vaslav Nijinsky was interned in Hungary and was replaced by Alexandre Gavrilo and Leonide Massine. The absence of these dancers should not have been a total surprise to the American management since the break between Nijinsky and Diaghilev had been an open secret, just as it was generally known that Leonide Massine, an immensely talented youth of twenty, was Diaghilev's new protégé. Fokine had left Diaghilev in 1914 and returned to the Marinsky Theatre as ballet master and choreographer and for the American tour he was replaced by Adolph Bolm in the double role of choreographer and premier danseur.

Although Bolm was not an experienced choreographer he accomplished the apparently impossible—there were twenty ballets to prepare—and by the time the season opened the company was in perfect condition and admirably rehearsed. Merle Armitage stresses very properly "the fact that America saw the Diaghilev Ballet with its character unimpaired is largely due to the prodigious efforts of Bolm." He was primarily a dancer and he had triumphed as an extraordinary character dancer in St. Petersburg and many European capitals, although in the Ballets Russes his position was overshadowed by the homage Diaghilev offered Nijinsky. But in many ways Bolm was prepared for the responsibility of carrying Diaghilev through this critical period. He had toured a great deal and had been with the Ballets Russes since 1909. He had been trained at the Imperial Ballet School in St. Petersburg and was graduated in 1904 with first prize. He distinguished himself as a soloist in the Imperial Ballet, and in 1908 and 1909 he had organized a touring ensemble with select members of the Imperial Ballet with Pavlova as prima ballerina.

While the American management may have been disappointed, the audiences were not, for even with reduced strength the Ballets Russes were the most exciting theatrical spectacles ever to have reached this country. What may have been lacking in absolute perfection was more than compensated for by the overwhelming total effect of the scenic presentation, the choreography and the music. It is the general opinion, particularly abroad, that the Diaghilev tour was a failure, partly because it was a financial fiasco and partly because Diaghilev left in a rage at the end of the first season. But while the significance of Fokine's creative reforms and Diaghilev's unique accomplishments may have escaped the majority of the audience, there was a far from negligible minority of discriminating people to whom this ballet was a revelation.

How deeply America had been impressed appeared many years later when the de Basil Ballets Russes were successfully promoted on the basis of Diaghilev's prestige. The two tours of the Ballets Russes in America may not have had immediately noticeable repercussions, but their consequences were lasting. They were the first forceful thrust of the modern ballet into public consciousness. As Lincoln Kirstein remarked, "Not only was the Diaghilev troupe pioneering in theatrically undeveloped territory, but aside from the big towns it was pioneering in a vacuum where up to that time only a circus could have prospered."

Nijinsky was released from Hungary and came to America at the end of the first season. The dissatisfaction with Diaghilev and the prestige of Nijinsky's name determined the management to appoint Nijinsky director of the second tour. The decision was unfortunate, both because it was an affront to Diaghilev and also because Nijinsky was hopelessly unsuited for an executive position. Nijinsky's success as a dancer here was overwhelming; the public responded magnificently to the greatest classical dancing they were to see in their time.

Aside from the memory of his extraordinary dancing, Nijinsky left several choreographic creations which proved the measure of his genius, but which achieved their full meaning and perfection only in his performance and in the Diaghilev setting. Til Eulenspiegel, which he created here, was his last work, for two years after his American appearance he had to be confined to the care of psychiatrists. The ballet was set to Richard Strauss's score; Nijinsky had long intended to stage it, but when he finally had the opportunity, he had to cope with the unfamiliar environment, the pressure of time and administrative functions, and he had sprained his ankle which made rehearsing extremely painful. The opinions on Til Eulenspiegel are strangely contradictory and a fair estimate of it is probably impossible. Robert Edmond Jones, the distinguished stage designer, published in Dance Index, 1945, a recollection of his collaboration with the Diaghilev Ballet on Til Eulenspiegel, the only American collaboration with that troupe. He was then a young inexperienced designer, honored with the commission to design décor and costumes for this production. We owe to this circumstance a document of unusual insight and sensitivity, an artist's appreciation of an artist. Telling of his first meeting with Nijinsky, Mr. Jones says he realized at once that he was in the presence of a genius. and continues. "I sensed . . . a quality in him which I can only define here as a continual preoccupation with standards high that they are really not of this world clear, concerns himself with incredible perfection.

The production of Til Eulenspiegel remained such perfection for even graver reasons than a injured foot. Nijinsky's sensitive mind had been in conflict with Diaghilev and by the overwhelming responsibilities with which he had to cope. Neither he nor anyone else responsibly connected with the company could have realized the success of the American tour seemed to have fully realized the success of the tour. Diaghilev and his experienced stage manager had been the basis of the smooth working of the organization. The company was used. After a few performances in New York and Boston, Til Eulenspiegel was withdrawn from the tour. This failure also ended another promising project, Franz Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

On this second tour in 1916-1917, Adolph Bolm joined the company at Diaghilev's insistence, to help him with his executive responsibilities. But Bolm was not a dancer; after his recovery he did not rejoin the company but decided to stay in America and in the meantime he organized the Ballet Intime in New York. It consisted of twelve dancers, among them the Oriana, Ratan Devi (who was actually an Indian) and Michio Ito. The programs consisted of an intermingling of music and dance numbers with Hindu, Japanese songs and dances and Russian songs accompanied by an orchestra. The Ballet Intime, under George Barrère's Little Symphony, toured and appeared successfully at the Coliseum Theatre in 1920.

During this period the Metropolitan Opera Company asked Bolm to stage Rimsky-Korsakoff's Le Coq d'Inde after Fokine; he also revived Petroushka in 1919, with choreography after Fokine, and Les Femmes d'Alger after Benois.

The first large-sized ballet of his own in which he measured the measure of his choreographic talent was the Infanta, performed at the Chicago Opera House in 1919. The production had particular interesting collaboration between a noted Russian and a group of American artists. The composer, George Carpenter, the designer, Robert Edmond Jones, and the rôle of the Infanta, Ruth Page, were nobility and beauty such as the American ballet had not produced before. At the end of the opera season, Bolm continued to perform with the Ballet Intime and introduced the ballet as stage show in motion-picture theatres like the Rivoli and the Rialto. In 1920 he made an interesting experiment in the modern idiom by using the George Herriman comic-strip character, Krazy Kat, for a jazz ballet with music by John Alden Carpenter. Two years later he was appointed ballet master and premier danseur at the Chicago Civic Opera, where he organized and directed a ballet school. In 1924 the Chicago Allied Arts was organized, the first progressive venture in the field of ballet in America, and Bolm served as ballet master, Ruth Page as première danseuse. Tamar Karsavina was introduced to the American public here and during his next three years with the organization, Bolm produced many ballets in a modern experimental spirit, distinguished in choreography and dancing as well as in music and design: Elopement (Mozart-Remisoff, 1924), Le Foyer de la Danse (Chabrier-Remisoff, 1924), The Rivals (Eichhaim-Remisoff, 1925), El Amor Brujo (de Falla-Rollo Peters, 1925), Little Circus (Offenbach-Remisoff, 1925), Christmas Carol (Vaughn Williams-Remisoff, 1924), Bal des Marionnettes (Satie-Remisoff, 1925), Mandragora (Szymanowsky-Remisoff, 1925), La Farce du Pont Neuf (Herscher-Jean Valmier, 1926), Parnassus au Montmartre (Satie-Remisoff, 1926), Pierrot Lunaire (Schoenberg-Remisoff, 1926), Tragedy of the 'Cello (Tansman-Remisoff, 1927) and a number of divertissements.

During this productive period, Bolm also returned to the Metropolitan to stage a new Petrouchka in honor of Stravinsky's arrival in America and spent six months in Buenos Aires as choreographer at the Teatro Colon with Ruth Page as première danseuse. In 1928 he was invited to arrange several ballets for the festival of the Chamber Music Society in Washington, D.C. On this occasion the Bolm-Stravinsky Apollon Musagète, commissioned by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, was performed for the first time. In addition, Bolm produced Alt-Wien (Beethoven-Remisoff), Arlechinata (Modonville-Remisoff) and Pavane pour une Infante Défunte (Ravel-Remisoff).

Called to Hollywood to arrange a ballet for the John Barrymore film The Mad Genius (1931), he composed a remarkable "mechanical ballet," set to Alexander Mossolov's score, which was cut out in the process of editing but performed in its entirety in the Hollywood Bowl in 1932 with the title Ballet Mécanique. In the same year Bolm was appointed ballet master at the San Francisco Opera, a position he filled with distinction for five years, establishing and directing a ballet school at the opera. Of the many ballets which he choreographed for that company the most noted was the Bach Cycle (1935) in three parts: Danse Noble, Lament and Consecration. He presented a new version of Stravinsky's Firebird at the Hollywood Bowl in 1940 with Nana Gollner in the title role and in the same year choreographed Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf for the Ballet Theatre. For this company he also created a new and not very fortunate interpretation of Firebird in 1945, with Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin and with the much discussed superb settings and costumes by Marc Chagall.

Adolph Bolm has spent more than thirty years of his immensely active and productive life as a dancer, teacher and choreographer in America. He was not only among the first prominent Russian ballet personalities to stay permanently in the United States but also one of the few with an intuitive understanding of this country's essential character, its aesthetic climate and its creative potentialities, and the scope and variety of his contributions to the American ballet—the organizations and schools he began, the works he created, the students he taught and developed—constitute an impressive achievement.

It is primarily through the "classics" created for the first Ballets Russes era—Scheherazade, Prince Igor, Carnaval, Petrouchka, Firebird, Les Sylphides, Le Spectre de la Rose, Cog d'Or—that Fokine has exerted, indirectly, his greatest influence on the American ballet; the younger American generation knew, really, no other ballet but the liberated, reformed and revitalized one he helped to create. Fokine did not come to America until 1919, but a large part of the repertory of the Diaghilev tour was his and these early masterpieces are in the repertory of several major companies. They have become common property, part of the world treasure of great ballets. It is unfortunate that Fokine himself did not control the fate of these works; since he left them to Diaghilev, numerous revivals have been staged over the years, though few of them by himself. This practice is of doubtful merit, for Fokine's works are no longer revolutionary and it is absurd to pretend that they represent the supreme balletic achievement of all time. And today not even the finest revival can hope to repeat the perfect conditions of the first performances. The combination of extraordinary dancers with congenial composers and painters, Fokine's creative inspiration in choreography, and Diaghilev's catalytic genius to coordinate them all, was unique in the history of the ballet. Les Sylphides was originally presented with Pavlova, Karsavina and Nijinsky; Prince Igor, with Bolm as the Polovtsian Chief; Carnaval, with Karsavina as Columbine, Nijinsky as Harlequin, Bolm as Pierrot; Scheherazade, with Ida Rubinstein as Zobeide and Nijinsky as the Favorite Slave.

The slovenly revivals of Fokine's ballets are an offense to Fokine's memory and an insult to the audience. Les Sylphides is the only one which has preserved its timeless beauty, not only because it is composed in the familiar classical medium, but primarily because Fokine himself restaged it carefully for the Ballet Theatre in 1940.

Like his ballets, the five principles of Fokine's ballet reform which he published in 1914 are no longer revolutionary but rather the starting point of the contemporary ballet. The first rule demands that the dance steps and movements correspond to the period and character of the nation presented; the second rule is that dancing and mimetic gesture serve as an expression of the dramatic action and have a definite connection with the theme of the ballet; the third rule is that the whole body be used as an expressive instrument; the fourth rule is that the expression be expanded and extended from the individual to the group and include the whole ensemble; the fifth rule is the fusion of the dancing with the other arts into a unified composition.

Michel Mikhailovitch Fokine was born in St. Petersburg in 1880 and studied at the Imperial School of Ballet, from which he was graduated with honors in 1898. His unusual talent and his brilliant mind were soon recognized and he was successful as a soloist with the company. At the start of his career he became dissatisfied with the rigid, conventional practice at the Marinsky Theatre and worked out a scenario for a ballet, Daphnis and Chloe, supplemented with clearly formulated suggestions for its production, and submitted it to the directors. Although his first attempt was without result, he pursued his work and studies and experimented with ballets for school and charity performances. It was during this period, in 1905, that he composed The Dying Swan for Pavlova, a choreographic masterwork in its simplicity and its sensitivity to the dancer's personality and remote and fragile beauty. It was technically revolutionary in that it was the reverse of the habitual brilliant and flashy bravura solo, but within its modest range it achieved a deeply moving quality with which Anna Pavlova was identified. It is probably the most famous dance of our time. In the following years Fokine created several ballets of which three were later taken into the Diaghilev repertory: The Animated Gobelins (1907), later called Le Pavillon d'Armide; Une Nuit d'Egypte (1908), later named

Cléopâtre; and Chopiniana (1908), which later became Les Sylphides.

Fokine joined Diaghilev in 1909 and left him in 1913. Nijinsky had caused the disagreement between the two men who owed so much to each other. Diaghilev, demonstrating the uncanny flair which was one of the secrets of his success, had discovered the latent choreographic talent in Nijinsky and proceeded to develop it. Fokine, who had been the company's only choreographer, resented possibly not so much the fellow-choreographer as the manifest personal preference Diaghilev showed his protégé. In 1914 Fokine returned for another season and staged Le Coq d'Or and a new work, La Légende de Joseph, for Diaghilev's new discovery, Massine. The break with Diaghilev, however, seemed to have affected Fokine in his creative core, for his subsequent work was not comparable in daring, originality and vision to the creations of the Ballets Russes era. Fokine survived by several decades the original impetus of the momentous reform he initiated. There was no further challenge for him. The liberation of the classical ballet from the rigid Imperial conventions was an established fact. The change he started was in continual progress, and the language of movement he had invented was understood and spoken by every dancer. New choreographers had started to articulate the aesthetic demands of younger and more radical generations.

He came to the United States at the invitation of Morris Gest to stage the dances for the musical Aphrodite, based on the novel by Pierre Louys, and did long years of similar work for innumerable revues and musical comedies. He founded a school of the ballet in New York in 1921 and the next year organized a small company, the Fokine Ballet. This company, headed by Fokine and his wife, Vera Fokina, was largely composed of advanced students, although prominent professional dancers were added as the need arose, and it performed at irregular intervals from 1922 until Fokine's death. The performances were very popular and those in the Lewisohn Stadium in New York drew huge crowds. In addition, Fokine and Fokina toured extensively in concerts. His choreographic work of this period is lost, for Fokine worked with a loose organization under inadequate conditions and largely with unfinished dancers. Under the circumstances the performances rarely achieved truly professional standards. As a training ground the company afforded invaluable opportunities for young dancers, but as the concluding chapter in the career of a great choreographer it was lamentably mediocre. In 1936-1937, Fokine staged several ballets for the Ballets Russes and in his last years the Ballet Theatre invited him to revive Les phides, Carnaval and Spectre de la Rose. For the same company he composed several new ballets, Bluebeard in 1941, Offenbach's music and, in 1942, the nostalgic tragedy, Russian Soldier, set to Prokofieff's Lieutenant Kije. He had started work on Helen of Troy, another Offenbach work, but he did not live to complete it and it was finished by David Lichner.

DIAGHILEV IN AMERICA

Cléopâtre; and Chopiniana (1908), which later became Les Sylphides.

Fokine joined Diaghilev in 1909 and left him in 1913. Nijinsky had caused the disagreement between the two men who owed so much to each other. Diaghilev, demonstrating the uncanny flair which was one of the secrets of his success, had discovered the latent choreographic talent in Nijinsky and proceeded to develop it. Fokine, who had been the company's only choreographer, resented possibly not so much the fellow-choreographer as the manifest personal preference Diaghilev showed his protégé. In 1914 Fokine returned for another season and staged Le Coq d'Or and a new work, La Légende de Joseph, for Diaghilev's new discovery, Massine. The break with Diaghilev, however, seemed to have affected Fokine in his creative core, for his subsequent work was not comparable in daring, originality and vision to the creations of the Ballets Russes era. Fokine survived by several decades the original impetus of the momentous reform he initiated. There was no further challenge for him. The liberation of the classical ballet from the rigid Imperial conventions was an established fact. The change he started was in continual progress, and the language of movement he had invented was understood and spoken by every dancer. New choreographers had started to articulate the aesthetic demands of younger and more radical generations.

He came to the United States at the invitation of Morris Gest to stage the dances for the musical Aphrodite, based on the novel by Pierre Louys, and did long years of similar work for innumerable revues and musical comedies. He founded a school of the ballet in New York in 1921 and the next year organized a small company, the Fokine Ballet. This company, headed by Fokine and his wife, Vera Fokina, was largely composed of advanced students, although prominent professional dancers were added as the need arose, and it performed at irregular intervals from 1922 until Fokine's death. The performances were very popular and those in the Lewisohn Stadium in New York drew huge crowds. In addition, Fokine and Fokina toured extensively in concerts. His choreographic work of this period is lost, for Fokine worked with a loose organization under inadequate conditions and largely with unfinished dancers. Under the circumstances the performances rarely achieved truly professional standards. As a training ground the company afforded invaluable opportunities for young dancers, but as the concluding chapter in the career of a great choreographer it was lamentably mediocre. In 1936-1937, Fokine staged several ballets for the Ballets Russes and in his last years the Ballet Theatre invited him to revive Les Sylphides, Carnaval and Spectre de la Rose. For the same company he composed several new ballets, Bluebeard in 1941 to Offenbach's music and, in 1942, the nostalgic tragedy, Russian Soldier, set to Prokofieff's Lieutenant Kije. He had started to work on Helen of Troy, another Offenbach work, but he did not live to complete it and it was finished by David Lichine.

The Ballet Russe I

THE DIAGHILEV SUCCESSION

THE DIAGHILEV COMPANY of the 1920's got its name—the Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo—from the patronage of the Prince of Monaco, who had offered the self-exiled Russian ballet security and ideal working conditions in the pleasant, elegant and sophisticated atmosphere of Monte Carlo. After Diaghilev's death in 1929, René Blum, a Frenchman of taste and culture, took over his vacant contract and organized the customary spring season of ballet in Monte Carlo. In 1932 he was joined by the energetic Russian, Colonel de Basil, who had previously managed a Russian opera company in Paris. The two men shared a passion for the ballet; they pulled together the disintegrated Diaghilev forces, reorganized the company and put on a successful Monte Carlo season.

George Balanchine created three charming works for them that year: Le Cotillon, La Concurrence and Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, which he later restaged. Then he left Monte Carlo to found his own company, Les Ballets 1933, in Paris. Meanwhile Leonide Massine gave up staging ballets at the Roxy in New York and joined the new Ballet Russe as choreographer. He contributed Jeux d'Enfants and Plages, his first symphonic ballets, Les Présages and Choreartium and two earlier works, Le beau Danube and Scuola di Ballo. These, combined with several older works from Diaghilev's program, including Prince Igor, Petrouchka and Les Sylphides, constituted a small but very presentable repertory. The new company had a successful season in Paris, made a tentative European tour, appeared the following summer for a triumphant visit to London and sailed for America in December, 1933.

At this point it is necessary to trace the genealogy of the vast family of original, Russian and Monte Carlo ballets in order to understand and disentangle the relationships between various companies with similar names, overlapping repertories and competitive aims. It is characteristic of this confusion that Colonel de Basil reorganized his company and changed its name six times in less than ten years: Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo (1932), Monte Carlo Ballet Russe (1933-1936), Col-oncl W. de Basil's Ballet Russe (1937), Covent Garden Ballet Russe (1938), Educational Ballet Russe, Ltd. (1939) and Original Ballet Russe (since 1940).

De Basil and René Blum were incompatible by temperament as well as artistic taste; they split in 1936. Blum, bound both by contract and predilection, organized a new Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo for which he engaged Michel Fokine as choreographer. De Basil lost the Monte Carlo connection and with it the symbolic Diaghilev association. For a while Massine remained with de Basil's company as ballet master; then he and de Basil had difficulties and parted in 1937. De Basil, supported by a newly formed corporation under the sponsorship of Prince Serge Obolensky, again changed the name of the company and obtained Fokine as choreographer. He also bought the entire wardrobe, scenery and costumes from the Diaghilev and Pavlova estates. Massine, too, found backers; in 1938 a group of sponsors was incorporated as Universal Art, with Julius Fleischmann as president and Sergei J. Denham as executive vice-president. Both de Basil's and Massine's companies were managed by S. Hurok. An attempted merger failed and the ballet war started. Universal Art secured the right to the "trademark" Monte Carlo from René Blum, and Massine's company functioned as the authentic Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. The contract with the Prince of Monaco called for a spring season of ballet in Monte Carlo, but left the company free for other commitments during the rest of the year; this agreement was ended by the war, although the title was retained. In 1943 Massine left the Ballet Russe to organize his own small company, the Ballet Russe Highlights, and since then Sergei J. Denham has been director of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, now a resident company in New York City.

As a result of these complicated comings and goings, conflicts constantly arise over the ownership of ballets; the question of copyright to choreographic creations definitely needs clarification. When the Ballet Russe was organized, Blum and de Basil legitimately owned the complete Diaghilev repertory and the ballets which they jointly commissioned from Balanchine and Massine. After their break, these rights apparently reverted to Blum, who held the contract with Monte Carlo and from whom Universal Art bought them for Massine's Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. But many of the Diaghilev titles, in particular Fokine's ballets, also appear in the de Basil repertory and, of course, in that of the Ballet Theatre, reorchestrated by Fokine himself. A spectacular suit was brought when de Basil announced Massine's ballets for a London season in year after their separation; the choreographer asked for a court decision to safeguard his rights. The case turned into a cause célèbre for the ballet world. The English court ruled in favor of de Basil, not only granting him ownership to those ballets but depriving Massine of the right to revive his own creation anywhere for a period of five years, excepting only The Three Cornered Hat, La Boutique Fantasque and Le Beau Danube.

Another grave problem arising from this situation was the scattering of a limited supply of outstanding talent among several companies. The record of fifteen years' consistent effort to maintain the Russian Ballet or the Ballet Russe or, more accurately, the Franco-Russian ballet of the late Diaghilev formula, reveals not only the perpetual struggle for the companies' physical survival, but duplication of effort and the absence of a constructive farsighted policy.

The Ballet Russe formula still held enough prestige and fascination to make the Monte Carlo connection coveted, but neither Blum nor de Basil nor any of the appointed or self-styled successors of Diaghilev, whatever their qualification and merits, had inherited the secret of his success. The continuation of the Ballet Russe depended on a few choreographers from the Diaghilev era: Fokine, Nijinska, Massine and Balanchine. (Lifar, ballet master of the Paris Opera, was not available.) For while good dancers were rare, choreographers capable of creating a new repertory in the Ballet Russe tradition were even rarer. And with the exception of Massine, no choreographer of stature stayed long enough with any of the Ballet Russe-style companies to identify his creative endeavor with the growth of the ensemble.

Colonel W. de Basil's Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo opened at the St. James Theatre in New York on December 21, 1933. It was a venture of considerable risk. If it had not been for Mihail Hurok's resourceful management and promotion, de Basil would certainly not have succeeded where Diaghilev had failed. But the prestige of the Ballets Russes had been built up long in advance by a sensational publicity campaign. The Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo were promoted on the basis of their Diaghilev association; the young dancers, whose names were unfamiliar even to traveled ballet connoisseurs, were advertised as "baby ballerinas." As it turned out, Toumanova, Baronova and Riabouchinska also happened to be fine dancers.

The program of the opening night, La Concurrence, Les Présages and Le Beau Danube, must have been a surprise for an audience which was prepared for Russian ballet of the pre-World War I description. They had, of course, rather expected the vigor of Prince Igor, the scandal of L'Après-midi d'un Faune, the sensuality of Scheherazade, the candor of Spectre de la Rose, all of which were in Diaghilev's American program of 1916-1917 and all of which had since lost point, meaning and interest. What the American public would have made of Parade, Mercure, La Chatte and Ode, the witty sophisticated products of Diaghilev's postwar experimental period, is a matter of conjecture. It is just possible that the mounting American interest in contemporary European art movements would have made them successful. As long as the Ballets Russes was going to revive the Diaghilev repertory, a few provocative works of more recent inspiration might have attracted an unprejudiced audience. But the fact is, the public was not unprejudiced; it had not been offered much of a chance to develop its own taste. It had been conditioned for a "Russian" repertory that dimly reflected the fading memories of an earlier epoch.

This tendency was the result of a consistently orthodox ballet policy which had been promoted for sentimental rather than aesthetic reasons. After the Russian revolution the large contingent of White Russian exiles in Western Europe tried to maintain what they could of Tsarist traditions. For them the Diaghilev ballet was a nostalgic symbol. As members of the nobility and the upper classes, they were true connoisseurs of the ballet, but of the Imperial Russian ballet as they remembered it from Moscow and St. Petersburg, and they disapproved of Diaghilev's cosmopolitan modernism. This group of old-time balletophiles was influential in the ballet world, supported as it was by a considerable number of outstanding exiled teachers from the former Imperial Russian schools whose opposition to liberal and progressive ideas was a matter of principle and self-preservation. The closest approximations to their conservative taste and understanding were ballets to music by Borodin, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and Tchaikovsky, with décors by Bakst, Benois, Korovin and Roerich. Diaghilev himself had been a renegade who had left Russia in protest against the ballet regime which the White Russians represented in spirit and conviction, and he was an autocrat and did not respond to their conservative suggestions. But de Basil, his successor, was a former Tsarist colonel. Even though this was a mere coincidence, it determined the artistic policy of the Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo.

In America the situation was different because there were no personal emotions involved—yet. The well-informed, discriminating balletophiles were in a negligible minority and the public at large neither knew nor cared what kind of spectacle the Russian ballet had to offer as long as it was entertaining. The impresario who introduced the new Ballets Russes to erica, then, assumed responsibility not only for success or failure, which was his business, but also for formative artistic taste, which was not. It is suggestive that Hurok, like de Basil, was a Russian and balletophile. In America, too, Russian ballet teachers influenced American youth; from the strictly professional viewpoint the training they afforded was impeccable and authoritative, but their prevailing spirit was that of the Imperial Academy before Fokine.

There are many people in ballet circles who have criticized Hurok for his policy in ballet management, particularly his admitted partiality to the 1909-1914 Diaghilev repertory, for his interference with the artistic direction of the companies, for his fervent and probably justified conviction that "stars pack the houses." In any case, the ballet in America does owe Mr. Hurok sincere gratitude for his work in propaganda and popularization which profited our native talent.

Yet, and partly through his efforts, the Ballets Russes have become synonymous with the ballet for the uninitiated American public, a misunderstanding which hindered the development of a native ballet.

By accident the Ballets Russes, soon after their New York debut, found themselves presenting a program that must have been the delight of every conservative balletophile in the country. Barely a month after the opening the company was compelled for contractual reasons to divide into two groups. One group, with Massine, Danilova and Tomanova, the major part of the corps de ballet and the greater part of the repertoire, was sent on tour. The other group, augmented by local dancers, stayed in New York and every day for many weeks presented Prince Igor, Petrouchka and Les Sylphides. The audience response in New York as well as on the road was highly gratifying; the Ballets Russes returned in the fall for a limited engagement and, for their third American season, they appeared for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House. This was an important step toward the consolidation of the company, both artistically and financially, for the Metropolitan is not only the only theatre with an adequate stage for ballet and with sufficient seating capacity to run at a profit, but also a house with established prestige. For those who care for facts, Mr. Hurok volunteers the information that the gross receipts for the fourth American season reached one million dollars.

It was during this successful season that the conflicts between de Basil and Massine became so acute that they surfaced. The two Ballets Russes, headed respectively by de Basil and Massine, resembled each other like twins. In composition of program policy and artistic direction, they manifested unmis-

Both companies were potentially strong at their formation—the Monte Carlo had a slightly superior and a definitely better balanced group—but a season-by-season account would show that neither company was able to build a permanent, coherent ensemble over the years.

Moscow in 1896 and studied drama and ballet at the Imperial School of the Theatre. When the break between Diaghilev and Nijinsky occurred in 1913, Diaghilev recognized the unusual potential talent in the young Massine and undertook to train him as Nijinsky's successor. Diaghilev realized, of course, that no dancer, no matter how gifted, could conceivably replace the unique phenomenon that was Nijinsky; he directed the young dancer toward a full development of his own talents. After a very short period of intensive work with the great teacher Cecchetti and Fokine, Massine made a memorable debut in 1914 in the title role of Richard Strauss's La Légende de Joseph. A year later he made an equally promising debut as choreographer with a suite of Russian folk dances, Le Soleil et la Nuit. Brilliantly intelligent, moved by tremendous nervous energies, Massine avidly absorbed everything the intellectual climate of Paris and the progressive Diaghilev circle had to offer in the way of inspiration and information. With the eccentric and fantastic ballet, Parade (1917), he proved how completely and easily he had caught the spirit of the avant-garde group which then dictated the art of the world from Paris. But his rich and versatile talent was solidly founded; it did not get lost in the snobbery of cliques.

When Massine arrived with the Ballet Russe, he was no stranger to America. He had toured with the Diaghilev company in his youth and between 1928 and 1931 he was premier danseur and choreographer at the Roxy Theatre in New York, staging a new ballet each week; among others, a full performance of Scheherazade. In 1930 he presented Stravinsky's Sacred Spring in Philadelphia and New York with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski's direction and with Martha Graham in the principal role.

The foundation of Massine's dancing and choreography is the classical danse d'école. But many important influences modified and enlarged his basic idiom until it assumed an enormous richness of expressive forms and symbols; there were certain elements of the modern expressionist dance and group movement, particularly as formulated by Rudolph von Laban and performed by Mary Wigman, and elements of the Russian and Spanish folk dance. Equally important, though harder to perceive, was the influence of the French poet Jean Cocteau who attempted to "rehabilitate the commonplace" in poetic evocations of the average realities, even banalities, which have lost their true, immanent, significance.

Massine, who is a superb dancer and an extraordinary stage personality, is primarily a character dancer, as one can feel in some of his most spectacular roles, such as the Miller in The Chinese was common as the two roads drew near each other and the final stages of construction became a competitive race ending at Promontory Point, in the State of Utah, where, in an elaborate ceremony, a spike of gold was driven into a tie of laurel to join the rails.

Surveyors and workmen are building the two converging sections of the railroad, Irishmen building from the East, Chinese from the West. As the Chinese work they are approached by a girl from the Big Tent called the Lady-Gay. The work is interrupted. The surveyor becomes amorous of the girl. The scene shifts to the Big Tent where Mexicans, gamblers, Irish workmen and girls are gathered at the bar. A Mormon missionary enters. The barkeeper entertains his guests. While they dance, the Lady-Gay enters with her surveyor, followed by some of the Chinese gang. The Irish surveyor approaches her. She prefers her original companion and they dance. Irishmen and Chinese threaten each other. A general fight is imminent. Suddenly the scene shifts back to the roadbed of the line. The hostility of the Big Tent has become a rivalry in work. The two gangs, driving the rails before them, approach each other while cheering crowds of women and Indians and Mexicans look on. The last rail is about to be laid. Pompously and solemnly the capitalists enter. The golden spike is driven into the tie of laurel. The telegraph instrument beside the track ticks out the word D-O-N-E. And while the nation celebrates with cannon and bells in San Francisco and Omaha and Chicago and with the hymn of "Old Hundred" played upon Trinity chimes in New York, the capitalists and workmen and girls and Indians pose before the camera at Promontory Point.

This unwieldy literary narrative conveys, better than any description of the actual spectacle, the feeling that this theme was more suitable for a D. W. Griffith epic than a Ballet Russe production. As a first attempt to bring a genuine American subject of some scope to visual life on the ballet stage, it was a courageous and meritorious venture. That it failed was not the fault of the genre, as Eugene Loring and Agnes de Mille proved a few years later.

The authors perceived the drama in the ethnic complexities of America and the technical conquest of the vast continent. It was consistent with this conception to stress the emotional and spatial tensions between anonymous groups, that is, the crews of workmen, but actually there was no feeling of human drama, or of "the plains and sierras" either. The immense acceleration as the two crews approach each other needs more space than this hectic and populated ballet afforded to become exciting. The scenario, by a distinguished American poet, should have been genuine and maybe it was, on paper; it was very fine in the establishment of action and locale, but weak in the treatment of the time element which defines the difference between a poet and a dramatist.

The clear and strong stylization of the drama proper and the realistic detail of the subsidiary play could not be developed and reconciled within the limited realm the book provided. While one admired Massine's magnificent choreographic treatment of groups and individuals one was also aware of the fact that the work failed to make any point, in spite of its final music-hall apotheosis. In the last analysis the ballet was American enough in theme, locale and names, but nowhere was there a forceful assertion of native feeling, implied in or derived from the subject. However, the piece was full of admirably worked out characters and delightful detail. Lillian Moore very properly calls Massine's own solo (he danced the role of the barkeeper) a "miniature masterpiece."

Probably Nabokoff's score, despite its use of familiar tunes was an additional obstacle in catching the native American flavor. Albert Johnson's settings were workmanlike and undistinguished, as were Irene Sharaff's period costumes.

The New Yorker (Book: Rea Irvin and Leonide Massine. Music: George Gershwin, orchestrated by David Raksin. Settings and Costumes: Carl Kent, after Rea Irvin and Nathalie Crothers).

A dioramic view of New York's café society in three scenes presents a nocturnal adventure of the animated drawings made famous by Peter Arno, Helen E. Hokinson, William Steig, Otto Soglow and other artists' creations whose habitude are the pages of the New Yorker magazine.—To Central Park's Plaza come Arno's Colonel Dowager and Timid Man; Hokinson's Clubwomen; boys and girls each intent on hotspotting. Venal headwaiters, baby-faced debutantes, keyhole columnists, Steig's "small fry," gullible gangsters, Thurber's introverts, Soglow's Little King, all these with gentle madness people the parade of New York after dark.—The thread of the story is incidental to the portrayal of characters whose lives begin when the city goes to bed.

This ballet, Massine's second excursion into the field of Americana, was not much more fortunate than Union Pacific. Probably its authors did not claim any broad human validity for the sketchy revue they composed, but they did not even succeed in matching the cutting neatness, the pointed brevity, the deadly wit and the subtle observations of the original cartoons from which the ballet was derived. Although New York café society may have some American qualities, artificial social attitudes, the ones used in this ballet, are as international as hotel lobbies, cocktail bars and bridge parties. The New Yorker might have been an amusing intimate revue; it was a wasted effort on the ballet stage.

Massine did not fare better with his third and last attempt to create an American ballet. The book and music for Saratoga were written by Jaromir Weinberger; Oliver Smith did the sets and Alvin Colt, the costumes. It was an ambitious, not to say pretentious, production with a pleasant theme, attractive décor and costumes and some lovely dancing. Potentially Saratoga may have had some of the ingredients of an American Georgette Parisienne but it turned out to be an uninspired piece of particular description or spirit. The score was exceptionally poor.

Massine's valiant attempts and signal failures in the American medium were additional proof that the Ballet Russe concept could not be reconciled indefinitely with the imperatives, though yet unformulated, demands of a new time and a new country. The old European audience, still held together from Diaghilev's time by sheer force of habit, continued to applaud the Ballet Russe seasons as recurrent social events. The new American audience, although less bound by tradition and sentiment, accepted the Ballet Russe because it was the only one they knew, because they had been persuaded that it was unquestionably the genuine best and principally, of course, because they liked it. With prodigious efforts Massine had created a fine company and maintained its standards as long as possible. But how long was it possible?

The Ballet Russe as a creative organism was without roots and sources. Diaghilev had relied on half a dozen choreographers and in his last years was faced by the problems of artistic inbreeding. But now the artistic problem was aggravated by political, social and economic problems which he had not had to face. The symptoms of growing chaos in Europe began to penetrate American consciousness, slowly, raising doubts of the validity, let alone the supremacy, of Old World standards. The significance of the Ballet Theatre's success was not lost on the American public and the pioneer work of Ruth Page in Chicago, Catherine Littlefield in Philadelphia, William Christensen in San Francisco and Lincoln Kirstein and Balanchine in New York had begun to bear fruit.

At the same time there were signs of weariness and disunity inside the Monte Carlo organization, robbing the performance of the irresistible effect of concerted effort and drive. Just how critical those internal difficulties were is hard to ascertain. Frictions and clashes are inevitable in so complex an organism depending on permanent, close contact between high-strung personalities. The strains of murderous touring schedules and overwork began to tell and the ensemble gradually disintegrated, as dancers deserted the company for less strenuous and more remunerative work. The surest indication of the Ball Russe's difficulties was Mr. Hurok's active interest in the Ballet Theatre at its inception. In his memoirs may be found a tactful but unequivocal paragraph dealing with this situation which actually amounts to an obituary for the Ballet Russe, whose management he was soon to relinquish.

Massine's answer to the accumulating problems was his extraordinary productivity. For several years he succeeded in keeping alive the interest of his dancers and his audience with an amazing output of choreographic novelties. They were of unequal value, it is true, but they were either stimulating and provocative, or delightfully danceable and a few, like Nobilissima Visione and Bacchanale, were works of great interest or distinction.

The imposing repertory that Massine built during his ten years' tenure with the Ballet Russe perpetuated the Diaghilev formula, as we have said, and not only in his own company. for it was literally copied and adopted by every other company organized since. Its chief characteristic is variety, even to the point and at the risk of confusion. The typical ballet program consists of an average of three complete ballets, usually with a pointless pas de deux thrown in for the sake of virtuosity. But neither the individual program nor the repertory policy at large show any awareness of style and direction. The customary argument that the program has to satisfy the public's widely divergent tastes is highly questionable if not false. Surely, there is an audience for every conceivable form and aesthetic level of theatrical entertainment, low-brow or sophisticated, but no audience worth keeping should be expected to enjoy indiscriminately the usual hodgepodge of an evening's ballet fare. No conductor would offer Gluck, Offenbach, Stravinsky and Richard Rodgers in one concert; no museum would display Benois, Dali, Gontcharova and Derain in one exhibition. Yet that is exactly what the ballet companies do. It may be convenient and realistic to justify the current practice by relating the taste of the public to the size and regularity of actual attendance. But on the other hand it is impossible to estimate how large a potential audience is staying away from the ballet, discouraged by the lack of plan and coherence in programming. That is not a purely academic consideration. There can be no doubt that the consistent work of George Balanchine in the classical style gained a vast and faithful audience for the Ballet Russe, just as Antony Tudor's psychological ballets<sup>22</sup> for the Ballet Theatre.

Massine's symphonic ballets originally implied a break with Diaghilev principles, for, as Lincoln Kirstein points out "could never have been tolerated by Diaghilev." But t the Ballet Russe responded well enough to immediate creative impulses, it never had enough drive to carry them on and develop them. When Massine left the Ballet Russe, discouraged and dissatisfied, nobody felt responsible for the preservation of his work. In spite of occasional announcements of forthcoming revivals, obstacles always seemed to overcome the good intentions.

This is partly due to changes which affected the whole policy of the Ballet Russe. Sergei J. Denham had been appointed director, with Massine, who stayed for one more year, as artistic director. An announcement for the 1942-1943 season stated

"this season is especially significant in the life of the Ballet de Monte Carlo, since for the first time in its history, it is on full and undivided responsibility for both artistic and business activities." While that sounds like a return to Diaghilev's autocratic principles, it merely indicated that the company would henceforth be run by a businessman with artistic responsibilities, instead of by an artist with business responsibilities. At that moment of interior crisis and wartime difficulties, unification of command, combined with cautious and real-commercial management, probably preserved the material existence of the company.

Also, since the Ballet Russe was no longer under Mr. Rok's management, it had lost the Metropolitan and was compelled to move into the dismal City Center Theatre. This change meant not only a serious disadvantage in the physical presentation of ballet; it also meant the need for adjustments in artistic policy, for the low-priced City Center was largely patronized by an unsophisticated audience without balletic education. It is quite possible that the unprepared portion of audience would not have appreciated the surrealist extravagance of Bacchanale or the somber spiritualism of Nobilissima Visione; but then, neither had the balletophiles. However, the public which applauded with genuine enthusiasm Balanchine's exact classical ballets would certainly be prepared for Massine's Seventh Symphony and Rouge et Noir.

It is unlikely that Bacchanale (1939) and Nobilissima Visione (1938) will ever be revived, because neither work has the level of quality which makes for great popular acceptance. However, both were remarkable—indeed, almost incredible—achievements, considering that they were conceived by the choreographer of Ode and The Three-Cornered Hat, La Boutique Fantasque and Les Matelots. The range of Massine's creative work is amazing and the greater must be our regret that such wealth of inspiration did not benefit the American ballet more fully and more permanently.

meaningful in translating a mystic experience into masterful kinesthetic language.

The Hindemith score, composed parallel to the successive phases of the choreography, made no obvious concessions to "danceability," that is, to convenient timing and rhythmic cues. The correspondence was one of feeling and it appeared consummately in the choreographic structure and in the noble and admirably restrained interpretation of Massine in the role of St. Francis. It was a profound thought to reveal Poverty in sublime beauty, movingly performed by Nini Theilade. Settings and costumes were designed by Pavel Tchelitchew. James Thrall Soby, in a study about the artist, called them "a contribution of a new and poignant romanticism to the theatre"; but they are painted in a lighter, more Italianate palette than the emotional color of Massine's and Hindemith's ascetic, medieval mysticism would have seemed to suggest.

Evidently nobody but Massine himself is capable of reviving his ballets. Hardly any dancers of the original casts have remained with the Ballet Russe to remember the choreography. But the contemporary ballet cannot afford the total loss of Massine's masterpieces, certainly not while the ancient Nutcracker and the faded Scheherazade are inflicted on audiences season after season in the patient name of tradition, and it is to be hoped that the directors of the Monte Carlo ballet will invite Massine to restage some of them. Aside from the Ballet Russe repertory, only Ballet Theatre's Aleko remains as witness of Massine's long years of activity in this country. How his work would affect today's ballet public is doubtful. It is true that Massine's serious, substantial compositions did not touch the general American public in a profound, emotional sense. There was always a mutual detachment in feeling, breeding respect rather than affection. The chapter is not closed, however, and should Massine return to work in America, he might find that our dancers and our audiences have grown, changed and matured.

The Ballet Russe III

THE AMERICANIZATION

CHRONOLOGICALLY as well as psychologically Massine's departure from the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo coincided pretty accurately with a change in its policy first demonstrated in the fall of 1942 when Agnes de Mille choreographed Rodeo. At first glance, there was nothing spectacular about the première of a pleasant and unassuming piece of Americana, but three circumstances made the event memorable, almost historic: First, it was evidence of a deliberate change of policy in the Ballet Russe; second, it showed that the Russian company had developed into an American one; third, it proved the artistic validity of a genre which heretofore had been tolerated rather than furthered.

Before Rodeo only a few American ballets by American artists had been presented by the major companies: Eugene Loring's Billy the Kid (1938) and The Great American Goof (1940), performed by the Ballet Theatre, and Marc Platoff's Ghost Town (1939), produced by the Ballet Russe. Ghost Town, with libretto and choreography by Marc Platoff (an American), music by Richard Rodgers and settings and costumes by Raoul Pène du Bois (also an American), was a real American collaboration. It was a charming and entertaining piece, with many delightful moments of genuine humor and good fun. The plot, however, was rather involved and introduced a great number of incidental characters who crowded the action and the stage. Consequently, the choreography became needlessly complicated and never had quite the time or space to develop freely. But the main problem was the casting. With the possible exception of Frederic Franklin, the protagonists had not the spontaneous feeling and the spirit to project convincing American characters. However, it was a step in the right direction, and three years later Agnes de Mille created Rodeo.

Rodeo or The Courting at Burnt Ranch (Book: Agnes de Mille. Music: Aaron Copland. Settings: Oliver Smith. Costumes: Kermit Love) is a Western Cinderella story about a tomboyish cowgirl who is awkwardly competing with the Raneher's Daughter for the attention of the men and in particular of the Champion Roper. Unversed in feminine arts, she is unpopular with the men and her mannish manners shock the visiting girls from Kansas City. Eventually, of course, she dresses up, joins the dance and wins her man.

The work has a solidly built plot, with enough drama to keep up the interest until the happy ending. Its conflicts are real and touching. Eugene Loring's Billy the Kid, the first important ballet of American origin, derived its poignant effect from its inherently tragic material. Rodeo deals with the more general emotions and experiences; everything becomes involved, then pleasantly resolved. While its anonymous characters have no historic significance or heroic stature, like those in Billy the Kid, they are none the less genuine and valid human beings and recognizably American.

The beauty and genuineness of Rodeo reside precisely in the apparent casualness of its American expression, in the deliberate lightness of touch, in the humorous understatement of emotional undercurrents. Yet it is all planned and timed with masterly accuracy. Miss de Mille makes her points with pithy precision, with admirable restraint and economy and without ever an effort or an effect wasted. The gauche little cowgirl is the natural center of the action, not simply because she is choreographically placed there, but much more because her personality imposes itself. And although Miss de Mille originally created the part for herself and danced it beautifully, subsequent changes in casting proved how firmly this character is conceived and established. All the characters, however, are equally clearly sketched with a few sure and deft strokes. The choreography is simple and effective, making extensive use of folk-dance material, ranch idiom and colloquialisms, with just a hint of commentary here and there. In an interlude the whole cast performs a regular square dance with calls and without any supporting music. This familiar scene has an inexplicable subtle charm and a captivating atmosphere which are entirely of the theatre. Aaron Copland's score has body and richness and it is just as genuine and honest and just as unselfconscious in its use of American source material as the choreography. Both are frankly theatrical, even in their tender moments and their quieter sentiments. Oliver Smith's sets were the best he had designed.

The kindred works, Eugene Loring's Billy the Kid and Agnes de Mille's Rodeo, have not yet been surpassed in the American genre. In our own ballet history they have the same significance as Petrushka, Scheherazade, Prince Igor and Cop d'Or had in the history of the ballet in Western Europe; one fervently hopes they will be spared the fate of Fokine's "classics" and will not be kept alive artificially after their time is up. The exemplary coherence of style achieved in the Russian works, as well as in the American ones, was due in both cases to the congenial collaboration of several talents. But, unlike Fokine, the American choreographers had neither the benefit of Diaghilev's genius of coordination, nor the ready riches of his resources. The responsibility for the unity, integrity and completeness of the total production rested entirely with the good will and mutual understanding of American artists comparatively inexperienced in the ballet medium. Their agreement was native and spontaneous. The common denominator, assuring singleness of purpose and direction, was their complete familiarity with the American spirit. Billy the Kid, however, had the misfortune to appear a few years too soon and within too narrow a frame for its scope. It had been direct and uncompromising in attack and it had tried for harder impact and deeper meanings than was customary in ballet choreography. Rodeo, on the other hand, was favored by many circumstances, by a more propitious timing, by a more engaging theme, by a more experienced ensemble, by better production facilities and by a readier and larger audience.

That an event of such special consequence for the ballet in America should have occurred in the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo instead of in the Ballet Theatre demonstrated that both companies were willing to modify their respective "all-Diaghilev" and "all-American" principles. These adjustments resulted in an equivocal program for both companies which was confusing to the public. Their repertories began to overlap and resemble each other and the difference between "Russian" and "American" was ever harder to tell. Just as the Ballet Theatre made a concession by engaging Massine, so the Monte Carlo was prepared to take a chance with an American choreographer—which was quite courageous since its previous attempts had failed. Since Rodeo was an unqualified success and the American genre had conclusively proved its value, the Ballet Russe invited other native choreographers to contribute to the repertory, notably Ruth Page, Todd Bolender, Valerie Bettis and Ruthanna Boris. Their productions were not so important in themselves, but they were symptoms of increasing change. The prewar Ballet Russe was fast losing glamor and prestige, as the brilliant Russian stars left the company, as the distinguished Russian choreographers began to repeat themselves, as the famous décors and costumes faded. The very basis of the Ballet Russe reputation—the classical repertory—was weakened to the danger point.

For a while there was hope that the great Russian choreographer, Bronislava Nijinska, would contribute those serious works in the classical medium which were so badly needed. In the same year in which Rodeo appeared, Nijinska choreographed two ballets for the Monte Carlo, Chopin Concerto and Snow Maiden, and the year after, Etude. Of these the Chopin Concerto, set to the Piano Concerto in E Minor, was by far the most important work. But, significantly enough, it was a prewar ballet, first performed by the Polish Ballet in Paris, in 1937. The most striking impression of this composition is one of an impeccable style with both the nobility of tradition and a contemporary feeling. The purity of its design, the transparency of its structure, the cleanness of its movement pattern, create an effect of truly classic perfection. The restaging preserved the flawless integrity of the original version, and it also carried with it the climate of Paris and the suggestive beauty of a vanishing era. It marked a moment of creative culmination, rather than of a new departure. It was the absolute ballet in retrospect. Snow Maiden, to music by Alexander Glazounov, with fine settings and costumes by Boris Aronson, is a handsome ballet, though not a very substantial one, and somehow the tender emotions and the delicate charm of the fairy story fail to register. On the whole, Nijinska's creations in America did not nearly achieve the distinction, originality and daring of her former work and they did not produce anything comparable to the boldness of Les Noces and the sophistication of Les Biches which she had done for the Diaghilev company.

The one single individual who miraculously rejuvenated the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo was George Balanchine. Actually all of Diaghilev's choreographic collaborators had been, or might have been, available at one time or another, although their contributions were very unequal in scope and in degree. Serge Lifar's brief connection with the Monte Carlo had been a sequence of unfortunate frictions and unpleasantnesses and lasted but one season. Michel Fokine had not been invited to stage new ballets while Massine was directing the company. Presumably for reasons of academic prestige, the repertory still lists Les Elves, taken over from Fokine's own company, and Don Juan, L'Epreuve d'Amour and Les Eléments, produced during the René Blum period. They are mere titles, for they were never successful here; they have not been performed in a long time and are not likely to be revived in the future. There were, of course, the inevitable "classics," Les Sylphides, Carnaval, Scheherazade, Spectre de la Rose, Petrouchka and Prince Igor, none of which, for inexplicable reasons, had the benefit of an authentic revival by the choreographer himself. For all the use the Ballet Russe made of Fokine's presence in America, he might as well not have existed at all. Massine and Nijinska had contributed all they had to give to the company. George Balanchine was the last of the Diaghilev choreographers to be called upon, the last one with Imperial Russian background, with Diaghilev associations and with an international prestige. He had returned from the extensive Latin American tour of the American Ballet and the company had been dissolved after its good-will mission; Balanchine was not connected with any other company at the time, and the Ballet Theatre had let the opportunity pass.

George Balanchine was born Georgei Melitonovitch Balanchivadze in St. Petersburg in 1904. His father was a well-known composer and the son's interest in music was so serious that he intended to become a concert pianist after he had graduated from the State School. He was admitted to the Imperial Dancing School in 1914, studying with Andreanov, Gerdt, Skiraev and Galikovsky. He was graduated in 1921 and entered the Marinsky ballet and at the same time the Conservatory of Music, in order to study piano, theory and composition. In Moscow he was deeply impressed and influenced by Kazian Yaroslavlevitch Golizovsky's revolutionary ideas on choreography and "modern" plastic gesture. In 1923 Balanchine organized performances of The Young Ballet which were successful with the young artists but which met with firm opposition on the part of the older academic masters. He arranged the dances for Ernst Toller's Broken Bow at the Mihailovsky Theatre, for Shaw's Caesar and Cleopatra at the Alexandrinsky Theatre and Milhaud's Boeuf sur le Toit at the Art Institute, and he danced at the Marinsky Theatre. In 1924 the Young Ballet was organized by Balanchivadze and Vladimir Dimitriev for an extensive European tour. This group included excellent dancers, among them Alexandra Danilova and Tamara Geva. In Paris they encountered Serge de Diaghilev, whose waning company was badly in need of new, well-trained dancers. Diaghilev incorporated the Soviet state dancers into his Ballets Russes and appointed the twenty-year-old Balanchivadze ballet master of the company. Then the difficult Georgian name was shortened to George Balanchine.

Balanchine produced ten ballets for Diaghilev: Le Rossignol (Strawinsky-Matisse, 1925), Barabau (Rieti-Utrillo, 1925), La Pastorale (Auric-Pruna, 1925), Jack-in-the-Box (Satie-Derain, 1926), Triumph of Neptune (Lord Berners, 1926), La Chatte (Sauguet-Gabo and Pevsner, 1927), Apollon Musagète (Strawinsky-Bauchant, 1928), Les Dieux Mendiants (Handel-Bakst and Juan Gris, 1928), Le Fils Prodigue (Prokofiev-Rouault, 1929), Le Bal (Rieti-Georges de Chirico, 1929). After Diaghilev's death in 1929, Balanchine went to Copenhagen as ballet master of the Royal Opera House and to London to choreograph opera ballets. He joined the Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo for its first season and created the three ballets we have mentioned before: La Concurrence (Auric-André Derain), Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (Strauss-Alexandre Benois) and Cotillon (Chabrier-Bérard). A year later, together with Vladimir Dimitriev, he founded his own company, Les Ballets 1933, for which he produced Errante (Schubert-Tcherepnin), Songes (Milhaud-Derain), Fastes (Sauguet-Derain), Mozartiana (Mozart-Tchaikowsky-Bérard), Les Sept Péchés Capitaux (Weill-Neher) and Les Valses (Beethoven-Terry). In the fall of 1933 he and Dimitriev left Europe to found, with Lincoln Kirstein and Edward M. M. Warburg, The School of American Ballet in New York.

Considering that from this list of some twenty works only two, Apollon and The Prodigal Son, remain in the current repertory, one may lament the futility of choreographic creation. But the ephemeral character of ballet is an essential part of its definition and the uniqueness of any one performance adds to the excitement of seeing a ballet. Time and again revivals are demanded by those who never saw the original as well as by those who recall it with delight, but a literally accurate record of past balletic achievements would be both illuminating and depressing, for with the passage of time our memory modifies the original experience to fit its current needs and values. The selective process which determines what shall be preserved in our cultural heritage is harsh, but it is never final.

Fortunately, enough Balanchine ballets have been presented in recent seasons to permit an appreciation of his work: Danses Concertantes, Concerto Barocco, Ballet Imperial, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (new version), Baiser de la Fée and Night Shadow at the Monte Carlo Company, The Prodigal Son at the Original Ballet Russe, Apollo and Waltz Academy at the Ballet Theatre, Divertimento, Renard and The Four Temperaments at the Ballet Society. The unity of style, even in such a diversity of subjects, is immediately observable. Yet this very quality, so unmistakable in actual performance, is elusive and hard to define.

Balanchine's compositions create the exhilarating illusion of effortless achievement. An appreciation of their extreme technical difficulties comes only as a surprising afterthought. A step-by-step analysis of Balanchine's choreography would disclose the admirable balance of its basic structure, but not the beauty of its functional perfection. There is probably no other choreographer who, with equal deliberation, conceives of movement as the ultimate result of his creative efforts. His own statement that, in ballet, "the important thing is the movement itself," implies that, for him, movement is not only the means and medium of dance expression; it is the absolute realization of what he calls "abstract memories of form." If style may be termed loosely an organic summation of separate aesthetic experiences, then Balanchine's style in all its variations, indicates clearly his preference for linear development and geometrical abstraction. This may account for the clarity and accuracy of his dance patterns and for the transparency, or what Denby calls the "luminosity," in the spacing of his figures.

Balanchine's often remarked "classicism" or "neo-classicism" has a double implication, one bearing directly on his specific, limpid style, the other on his consistent use of the basic academic idiom. The flawless execution of Balanchine's choreographic compositions is as delicate and exacting a task as the playing of a Mozart score. A good deal of their particular charm resides in the deceptive ease with which they are rendered. The supreme mastery required of every executant is directly derived from the discipline of the danse d'école and from absolute confidence in an approved kinetic system. No matter how complex, stylized, abstracted or even distorted, the choreographic work is composed of basic steps and basic movements "in an endless chain of infinite combinations," as Balanchine says. In creating a ballet the choreographer conveys his ideas by means of this basic technical vocabulary; he relies entirely on the dancer's familiarity with it. If this sounds elementary, it indicates nevertheless an essential characteristic of Balanchine's choreographic method. For his richly imaginative use of the dancer's body in expressive movements or repose is determined by the functional mechanics of the classical technique. In the last analysis Balanchine is not interested in the dancer as an individual, but in the dancer as a perfected instrument.

His compositions glorify the classical dance, they do not glamorize the individual dancer. And for this reason some virtuoso dancers, used to star positions, have disliked or even refused to work with him. But like every sensitive artist, Balanchine is naturally influenced by the potential qualities of the material with which he works, specifically the dancers. No matter how complex and difficult the movements he designs, it never destroys or violates the integrity of the executants' human uniqueness. In choreographing for groups he treats the collective unit exactly as he does the individual dancer, that is, as something specific and unique. The self-denying discipline he imposes ultimately benefits the dancer, for the soloist emerges, at a given moment, from the ensemble much as a magnificent solo instrument arises from the symphonic accord of an orchestra, carried and carrying at the same time.

There is a singular climate of suspense in Balanchine's ballets, totally different in character from the dramatic suspense engendered by a plot or a psychological conflict. "The visual spectacle, not the story, is the essential element," states Balanchine. The libretto is relevant only to the extent that it furnishes danceable substance, but there is no trace of literal explanation or descriptive pantomime. The story of Apollon, for instance, never degenerates from a poetic vision into realistic narrative or explicit symbolism. The material potentialities of the story are not nearly exhausted. There remains a wealth of unexplored and unexploited substance which stimulates and challenges the imagination. Yet there is never a feeling of imperfection or frustration, because one agrees spontaneously with the choreographer's selection of essentials. In watching a Balanchine composition, our perception seems to be sharpened and sensitized to experience of a high poetic order. While unfolding in space, the range of significant movement seems to extend beyond the field of physical vision and the moving figures thus define mysterious relationships which transcend physical contacts and connotations. The composer Elliott Carter once observed that "there is something magical and stirring about this drawing of the invisible lines in the air."

The repertory Balanchine brought to the Ballet Russe consisted of a number of older compositions, like Mozartiana (1933) and Serenade (1935), of more recent ones, created for the American Ballet, like Baiser de la Fée (1937), Jeu de Cartes (1937), Concerto Barocco (1941) and Ballet Imperial (1941) and a number of new ones, especially choreographed for the Monte Carlo, Danses Concertantes (1944), Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1944) and The Night Shadow (1946).

To understand the significance of Balanchine's active presence in the Ballet Russe, it is not nearly so important to analyze in detail the ballets he staged for this organization, as it is to appreciate the essential character of his contribution. It is probably accurate enough to identify Balanchine's work with the absolute classical tradition in theatrical dancing. Concerto Barocco in 1941 manifested a new departure and a definitive clarification of his style, implying an unhostile rejection the romanticism and folklore of the Fokine tradition. Now thoroughly revolutionary was Balanchine's new tendency concealed by the sheer aesthetic appeal of the performance and, even more, by the choreographer's undeniable respect for the basic danse d'école. But just as no one before Fokine had realized the potentialities of the traditional school for pressing material of contemporary interest, so no one before Balanchine had expanded the classic idiom to the magnificently expressive richness it assumes in his creations. It is purely classic, too, in the sense that it remained free from any inspiration of the expressional dance which had so profoundly influenced Fokine's, Nijinska's and Massine's choreographic concepts. Strictly speaking, Balanchine's new direction was no more the "revival" or rejuvenation of a latent style than was Fokine's earlier in the century, or than the humanistic inspiration of the Renaissance was a revival of the Greek classicism. In each instance the essential process was the reaffirmation of absolute laws of balance, harmony, proportion and functional perfection, in the spirit of the aesthetic ideal of a new era. Tradition, properly understood, is not simply the faithful continuation of established practices, but the perpetual rediscovery and reapplication of those basic laws, as stated and amplified in the cumulative wisdom of countless generations.

The original impulse for Balanchine's creative inspiration is music, or rather, the relation between music and movement. Rhythm and emotion, in sound and motion, are identical for every individual work that materializes in performance. Balanchine explains: "The organizing of rhythm on a grand scale is a sustained process. It is a function of the musical mind." Since Concerto Barocco, Balanchine has avoided ballets with literary content, and the two exceptions, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme and The Night Shadow, hardly rank with his best accomplishments. His inventiveness is greatest in pure, abstract dance design. In the Ballet Russe repertory are three abstract or plotless ballets, Concerto Barocco (Bach), Ballet Imperial (Tchaikowsky) and Danses Concertantes (Strawinsky), which demonstrate that the dramatic pathos, as well as the lyrical emotion, inherent in the score are directly transformed into movement impetus without any cerebral strain or visible mechanical effort.

Although Balanchine has, more precisely than anyone else, formed and formulated the classical style of the contemporary American ballet, he has never used native subject matter, except in the collegiate trifle, Alma Mater (1934), but there is more to the creation of an American ballet than the use of local color. Very few compositions in Balanchine's work could have been defined in terms of historical time and geographical place, but they clearly indicated the time and the place of their creation. Thus Balanchine's American work gives evidence of native character, but evokes no such literally recognizable associations, as do Saratoga or Rodeo. Balanchine's understanding stems from long years of practical experience and intensive work with American dancers, both in the classroom and on the stage. It is a mutual relationship, with mutual obligations and responsibilities loyally fulfilled. Consequently it would be just as correct to say that Balanchine's choreographic style is undeniably influenced by the qualities of our dancers as it is true to say that they owe him the realization of their latent style. As we watch our dancers, this style is revealed in the manner of execution, suggestive of the spirit which motivates and animates it. It evolves from movement-feeling and movement-tenor, from the ambient climate and the unconscious possession of a cultural heritage. Presupposing the same absolute technical finish, the same movement phrase would be different in different countries: a Russian dancer would tend to demonstrate more power, a French dancer more poise, an American dancer more speed.

When Balanchine withdrew from the Ballet Russe as permanent collaborator, in order to devote himself to the organization of the Ballet Society, the company was again left without a choreographer. The situation was perilous not only for the repertory, but even more for the maintenance of group discipline, collective morale and performing standards. In 1944 Frederic Franklin was appointed ballet master, a position for which he was eminently qualified both by his professional experience and by his personal integrity. It is doubtless due to his skill and efforts that the overworked ensemble has preserved its precious repertory without the benefit of a resident choreographer. It is not an easy task. Since Franklin is not a choreographer, he never had the opportunity of inspiring the company with the unique experience of a collective working-out of a creation; he could not impose the discipline of a unified style which is justified in terms of a creative intention. His was and still is the responsibility for the choreographic integrity and the accuracy of execution of some twenty-odd active ballets which constitute the company's main asset. Potentially it is a rather imposing repertory. In reality, some of the productions of the classical ballets are unpardonably shoddy, other works are frequently inadequately rehearsed or cast and the actual seasonal programs fall far short of the balance, variety and stimulation that the choice of available titles seems to suggest.

In recent years the Ballet Russe has been compelled to work with various guest choreographers of unequal stature. They have had uneven success and a meager total result. Igor Schwesoff staged The Red Poppy (1943), to music by Reinhold Gliere, with settings and costumes by Boris Aronson and a dramatic role for Alexandra Danilova; it was a workmanlike piece with an abundance of dramatic action, but without artistic distinction. Pilar Lopez, the sister of Argentinita, did The Cuckold's Fair (1943), to music by Gustavo Pittaluga, with a décor by Joan Junyer, an excursion into Spanish folklore—a wonderful subject in a pedestrian performance. Another Spanish piece, Madroños (1947), by Antonia Cobos, to music by Moszkowsky, Yradier and others, with exquisite costumes by Castillo, is a slight, but pleasant and stylish composition. Todd Bolender choreographed Commedia Balletica, with music by Igor Stravinsky and décor and costumes by Robert Davison. Miss Danilova herself, assisted by George Balanchine, presented a three-act Raymonda (1946), the revival of a Petipa work, set to music by Alexander Glazounov, with unbelievably dull and antiquated settings and costumes, especially commissioned from the old master, Alexander Benois. It was an anachronism, like playing at Imperial Russian Ballet. Danilova evidently enjoyed herself immensely in the title role; she is such a brilliant dancer and has such irresistible stage personality that one actually did not mind the fanciful ballet that went with her performance. Edward Caton contributed a stillborn piece of Americana, called Lola Montez (1947), occurring "in a Midwestern Town in the period of the Gold Rush," with a specially composed score by Fred Witt and the old décor and most of the costumes by Raoul Pène du Bois salvaged from Ghost Town. This act of rescue, presumably, was the reason for doing the ballet. Ruthanna Boris made her choreographic début with the charming Cirque de Deux (1947). Ruth Page revived Frankie and Johnny (originally composed in 1938) and created a new ballet, The Bells (1946), and Valerie Bettis experimented with Virginia Sampler (1947).

This record shows a laudable effort, but little artistic plan or discrimination. It is in no way comparable to the brilliance and vitality of the company's first years, the interest and excitement of the Massine period, and the elegance and distinction of the Balanchine work. Since Balanchine's departure not one ballet of consequence has been added to the repertory. Todd Bolender and Ruthanna Boris are very promising talents in the classical field and, if given the opportunity, may assert distinct choreographic personalities. Antonia Cobos is an artist of wit and originality, entirely capable of working on a large scalp, as she proved elsewhere with the delightful Mute Wife.

Virginia Sampler, with book and choreography by Valeric Bettis, music by Leo Smit and setting and costumes by Charles Elson, was an interesting and unsuccessful experiment. It had only a sketchy story about the disruption of the conventional pattern of a Virginia town, in the period after the American Revolution, by the arrival of strangers, frontiersmen, soldiers and a mysterious Woman on Horseback. The ensuing conflicts were not fully developed in ballet terms; they merely served the purpose of contrast and color. The dramatic tensions were slight and the emotional range was narrow. This limitation was partly deliberate, to suit the modest size of the work, partly due to peculiar circumstances. Miss Bettis, who has an established reputation in the field of expressional dance, both as a choreographer and a performer, had no experience in the ballet idiom. Because of her particular background, she was used to a different kind of dance impulse and dynamic response, another kinesthetic pattern and a more directly intuitive projection of emotional states. The result was altogether unsatisfactory, since the dancers went quasi-mechanically through the motions prescribed in the choreography, but evidently, through no fault of theirs, did not fully grasp the essential meaning they were called upon to convey.

In the ballet, Eugene Loring, Agnes de Mille and Antony Tudor, and Fokine, Nijinska and Massine before them, have shown the influence of the expressional dance in varying degrees. This refers not merely to movement tendencies, muscular function and the characteristic displacing of the center of gravity away from the balletic vertical; it is even more notable in the introspective tendencies of new ballets as against the character of the strict classical ballet. Massine's St. Francis and Tudor's Jardin aux Lilas are two striking examples. But to expect or attempt a fusion between classical ballet and expressional dance amounts to denying the very origin and the essential function of either. It is clear that the psychological ballets of Antony Tudor, for instance, approach the problem of emotional expressiveness from a basic aesthetic concept diametrically opposed to that of Martha Graham, Doris Humphrey and Valerie Bettis. Thus, Virginia Sampler ended on a compromise which was not satisfactory in balletic, or in expressional terms. And it was very revealing that by far the most compelling performance in the ballet was Miss Bettis's own portrayal of the mysterious lady. She is, of course, a magnificent dancer in any terms. Leo Smit's music was handsome and danceable but Charles Elson's décor was rather too neutrally reserved to blend with the ballet's lively action.

Two other young native choreographers each produced a fine ballet for the Ballet Russe that showed just as much American spirit in abstract invention, in fact, that seemed the consummation of the cleanness and precision, the ease and friendliness we have come to associate with our dancers. Ruthanna Boris choreographed a delightful little ballet called Cirque de Deux, set to the ballet music from Gounod's Faust, with an ingeniously simple and charming décor and costumes by Robert Davison. In form it is a classical pas de deux, with an extra couple of attendants. The grand adagio is wittily designed as a devastating exhibition number on a mechanical turntable, and several circus acts provide the material for the ballerina's and her partner's variation. Within its modest size and ambition the work achieves perfection. Todd Bolender composed a Comedia Balletica, to music by Igor Stravinsky, with décor and costumes by Robert Davison. Formerly called Musical Chairs, the whole action of the ballet consists of the change of seats between five dancers, with solos, duets and ensemble numbers in between. It is pure dancing in the classical idiom, yet with a subtle comment, a twist of irony, a hint of eccentricity, all of which amounts to an original and fascinating little piece of balletic fun.

In spite of these and other assets, at the present moment the Ballet Russe is in a critical though not desperate position. Some of the old prestige of the Russian-Diaghilev-Paris-Riviera associations still elings to its name—which is no doubt useful for promotion purposes. But the American public has become ballet wise, and the war and postwar experiences have seriously discredited the old idea of European supremacy in art. The Ballet Russe has a rich repertory, with a good balance of traditional and modern ballets, with some of Fokine's, Massine's and Balanchine's unequaled masterpieces, and with some worthwhile Americana and experimental works. But this repertory needs a thorough revision in terms of modern requirements and standards. It must be revived and restaged and be kept alive under competent direction, preferably by the original choreographers. The preservation of the so-called "classics," such as The Nutcracker, Scheherazade, Swan Lake, so prominently featured in the repertory, must be justified with first-rate performances, careful productions and general respect for the integrity of each work of art. The old décor and costumes must either be discarded or authentically restored, and in many cases new designs are indicated. Swan Lake is a case in point.

One of the Ballet Russe's greatest assets is the ballerina assoluta, Alexandra Danilova, a dancer who possesses the magic of personality, who is adored by the public and respected by her colleagues. But no one dancer is strong enough to carry the responsibilities and the inhuman strain of such a lonely position. The Toumanova, Riabouchinska, Baronova, Slavenko, Markova, Youskevitch, Eglevsky and Massine of the former seasons are irretrievably lost and many fine younger artists, like Maria Tallchief and Marie-Jeanne, and a score of less accomplished ones of unusual promise have recently deserted the company. The Ballet Russe must establish a policy which makes it attractive for the dancers to stay, not so much in terms of salary as in terms of growth. Freedom from guest stars affords opportunity for young dancers to develop, provided they have the chance to work with good choreographers. At present, Mary Ellen Moylan and Ruthanna Boris seem to have ballerina potentialities. On the male side, the roster is distressingly poor. The excellent and versatile Frederic Frankin and the immensely talented and pleasant Leon Danclia are the only ranking soloists. They, too, are inevitably overworked. The Ballet Russe has the advantage of unified direction and undivided responsibility under Sergei Denham, and praise as well as blame for the present situation should go exclusively to him.

Many circumstances, of course, are determined not by principles of policy, but by the force of objective factors. From the outside it is impossible to estimate the financial situation and the restrictions and limitations dictated by budget considerations. Many of the shortcomings in production may be explained by the inadequate stage facilities at the City Center. The touring schedule is the ruin of any ensemble; the physical and moral hardships of a transcontinental trip kill spirit and initiative and illusions. Also, the settings and costumes suffer from continual traveling. The fast turnover in the ensemble, largely resulting from these demoralizing tours, makes any long-range personnel policy and continuity of work nearly impossible. However, an audience is not concerned with backstage problems and the difficulties of running a large ballet company. To suggest or initiate remedies is not the public's task.

It is not too optimistic, but quite deliberately realistic, to expect the Ballet Russe to live up to its former prestige and to the expectations of our dancers and our audience. The future of the Ballet Russe depends on the quality of its ensemble, the quality of its repertory, the quality of its productions and a clearly stated, progressive policy. America cannot afford to lose the Ballet Russe; neither can it tolerate its being less than perfect.

Three American Pioneers

DURING THE DECADES of Russian supremacy on the American ballet stage, a few Americans working in the ballet were able to assert their abilities and win themselves leading positions. William Christensen, Catherine Littlefield and Ruth Page were the first of these; they were convinced that American dancers had come of age and they worked with determination and consistency to prove themselves and their companies.

They were wise enough not to attempt the conquest of New York with its unpredictable metropolitan audience; instead, each of them concentrated in a local theatrical center where the public's willingness to respond compensated for its lack of balletic education. In terms of organization they followed the European tradition of affiliating their companies with large existing opera houses—William Christensen, with the San Francisco Opera, Catherine Littlefield, with the Philadelphia Opera and Ruth Page, with the Chicago Opera.

William Christensen, the eldest of three dancing brothers, was born in Utah; the family had a dance tradition and the three boys started their early training with their parents, continued in the ballet school of their uncle, L. P. Christensen, and later studied with Fokine, Novikoff and Vladimiroff. William established himself in San Francisco, dancing, teaching and organizing a small company. In 1937 he was appointed artistic director, ballet master and principal dancer of the San Francisco Opera Company. He had trained many of the members of the company; among his distinguished students were Janet Reed, who became prima ballerina of the new company, and Harold Lang. In the next few years the group made some very successful tours in the West and Middle West—in Portland, Seattle, Omaha, Wichita and many other places. The company expanded gradually and built a fine, well-balanced repertory, including Rumanian Wedding (1936) with music by Georges Enesco, Romeo and Juliet (1938) to Tchaikovsky's score, A Bach Suite (1938), Swan Lake (1941) and Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique (graphed most of the repertory his

In November 1947 the company
pendent organization—the San F

ation—with a long-range program for the development of a permanent resident and touring company on the west coast, under Christensen's artistic direction with Irving Deakin as general manager. This is a new and promising chapter in the already remarkable ballet history of the city. The San Francisco Opera Ballet had been organized as early as 1923 by the Italian director Natalie Carosio; she had been succeeded by Serge Oukrainsky, Theodore Kosloff and Adolph Bolm as ballet masters.

Christensen has made an invaluable contribution to the ballet in America during ten years of methodical work in one place and with one group entirely composed of native dancers. In the confused and constantly shifting ballet picture in America today the San Francisco Ballet is a telling example of what admirable results can be achieved in a modest frame with personal and artistic integrity and singleness of purpose and direction.

Catherine Littlefield's career is more varied than Christensen's, although her main contribution, too, was made with one company. She was born in Philadelphia in 1908 and first trained by her mother, Caroline Littlefield; later she studied with Luigi Albertieri in New York and Leo Staats and Lubov Egorova in Paris. She made her début in Ziegfeld's Sally in 1923 and danced in several other Ziegfeld productions and at the Roxy. In 1925 she became première danseuse of the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company and from 1926 to 1933 was première danseuse with the Chicago Opera Company. She staged all the ballets in the opera repertory and quickly won a reputation as a choreographer.

In 1934 she formed the Cathcrine Littlefield Ballet Company, made up of thirty young American dancers; Leopold Stokowski became interested in the organization and offered it the exceptional advantage of performing regularly with the Philadelphia Symphony, under himself and, later, with Alexander Smallens. Encouraged by the immediate success of her small group, Miss Littlefield organized the Philadelphia Ballet Company in 1936, a large, permanent repertory company with sixty American dancers. Miss Littlefield was directress and première danseuse; Alexis Dolinoff de Wels was ballet master and premier danseur from 1935 to 1937. Except for Dolinoff the group was exclusively composed of American-born and -trained dancers, including Joan McCracken, Karen Conrad, Miriam Golden, Dorothy Littlefield and Jack Potteiger. In 1936 this company presented the first performance of Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe since Diaghilev's visit in 1916 and, in 1937, a complete version of Tchaikowsky's The Sleeping Beauty, a ballet whose last act is usually given alone as Aurora's Wedding. In a comparatively short time Miss Littlefield had built a substantial repertory of more than twenty ballets.

The Philadelphia Ballet was invited, as a representative American company, to appear in Paris during the International Exposition in 1937 and performed one week at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées in Paris, then one week in Brussels, three days in The Hague and three weeks in London. It was the first American ballet company to visit Europe and it was enthusiastically received; in particular, Miss Littlefield's Barn Dance seemed to captivate European audiences.

Barn Dance, with music by David Guion, L. M. Gottschalk and John Powell, and setting and costumes by Salvatore Pincherle has no connected story, except for an inconsequential bit about a country girl who has "gone wrong" and reforms. It consists of a sequence of lively scenes which are mainly—and exuberantly—dancing. The sources are square dances, reels, round dances and other American community dances, broadened, strengthened and organized for theatrical effect while preserving the inherent form and spirit. Miss Littlefield controls the popular medium with wonderful humorous superiority, consistently avoiding the air of slightly pedantic dedication which so often prevails in the gatherings of folk-dance addicts. The freshness and spontaneity of the ballet is derived not so much from folklore material as from the inexhaustible stock of American legend alive in its people, its types, its humor. Above all, it is full-bodied theatre and dance and an admirably expert job of ensemble composition. Everything seems to happen at once on the almost constantly crowded stage, although never for a moment is there any danger of confusion. The music is nicely fitting in rhythm and spirit, though the setting and costumes are regrettably inept. Barn Dance was revived for the Ballet Theatre by Miss Littlefield in 1944.

In general, Catherine Littlefield showed a marked interest in American subjects and usually employed American composers and designers. Among her best-known works are Snow Queen (1935), Terminal (1937), Parable in Blue (1937), Let the Righteous Be Glad (1937), Ladies' Better Dresses (1938) and Café Society (1939), all of which were well received, although none of them is a work of great distinction. The scores were not outstanding and the designers were not artists of great stature. The fine collective spirit of the group and Miss Littlefield's authoritative direction appeared in the cleanliness, coherence and unity of each production; the work pleasant and competent, but it lacked daring, breadth and a keen contemporary feeling. In 1939 the Chicago Civic Opera engaged the company as its official ballet; in 1940 Miss Littlefield staged the dances for Albert Johnson's American Jubilee at the World's Fair in New York, presenting her ballet with Paul Haakon. Since the 1940 revue, It Happens On Ice, Miss Littlefield has been engaged for all the consecutive ice shows at the Center Theatre in New York.

Ruth Page is the most progressive and intellectually and artistically curious of these three ballet pioneers. She was born in Indianapolis, studied with Ivan Clustine, the ballet master of the Pavlova company, and joined this company on an extensive Latin American tour. She continued her studies with Adolph Bolm, who cast her in the role of the Infanta in John Alden Carpenter's The Birthday of the Infanta at the Chicago Opera Company. As principal dancer in Bolm's Ballet Intime, she toured America and went to London in 1920. For two years she danced in Irving Berlin's second Music Box Revue and joined the Chicago Allied Arts as première danseuse in 1924. She also appeared briefly with the Diaghilev company while she was studying with Maestro Cecchetti in Monte Carlo in 1925. In the same year she accompanied Adolph Bolm as première danseuse at the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires. From 1926 to 1931 she was ballet mistress and principal dancer with the Ravinia Opera Company, the open-air festival theatre near Chicago. During the winter season of 1926-1927 and again the following year, she was guest solo dancer at the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York. She made an Oriental tour with a small company in 1928 and presented a series of American Dances before workers' societies in Moscow in 1930. She toured America in solo concerts and toured for two seasons with Harald Kreutzberg in 1932. In 1934 Miss Page was appointed ballet director and première danseuse at the reorganized Chicago Grand Opera Company, a position she held until 1937. She and Bentley Stone, the premier danseur of the company, toured in a concert program until they organized the Page-Stone Ballet Company in 1938. Stone had first won recognition in Broadway musicals and as a partner of Margaret Severn. He was born in Plankinton, South Dakota, and was soloist with the Chicago Civic Opera Company from 1930 to 1932 and in 1933 was the principal dancer of the Chicago Grand Opera Ballet under Laurent Novikoff, and from 1934 to 1937, under Miss Page. In 1937 he was affiliated with the Marie Rambert Ballet in London and danced several leading roles. In 1938 he joined Miss Page as first dancer and co-director of the Federal Theatre Project in Chicago, for which they jointly created Frankie and Johnny (1938) and Guns and Castanets (1939).

Frankie and Johnny, which Miss Page restaged for the Monte Carlo ballet, is based on what Carl Sandburg has called America's "classical gutter song." The book is by Michael Blandford and Jerome Moross; Jerome Moross composed the music, Clive Rickabaugh designed the set, and Paul DuPont, the costumes.

The program reads:

Faithful Frankie loves Johnny. Johnny loves Frankie, too. But immediately after a tender love duet with her, he visits Nelly Bly. Then "Frankie goes down to the corner saloon to buy her a large glass of beer." Her friends form a group around Nelly and Johnny to keep Frankie from seeing what is going on between them. However, the bartender takes keen delight in telling her the real situation, which at first she refuses to believe. Now "Frankie was a good girl as everybody knows" but when she finally realizes that Johnny is actually in love with Nelly, she works herself up into a frenzy of jealousy, and melodramatically shoots Johnny "root-a-toot-toot." All their friends have a fine time celebrating at Johnny's wake. Frankie tries to hang herself, but is saved by Nelly. Finally Frankie is left alone with her lover in the coffin, and the philosophic words of the Three Singers are heard in song:

*This story ain't got no moral,
This story ain't got no end,
This story just goes to show you,
That you can't put no trust in any man.*

This bawdy and violent melodrama is decidedly odd company for Swan Lake and Giselle and its legitimacy on the ballet stage is debatable. But the definition of the ballet genre has become rather loose and inclusive and in its own terms Frankie and Johnny is an admirable theatre piece, solid, tight, fast and dramatic. Its action occurs on a level of imagination which removes it entirely from the police-blotter reality and its unpleasant concrete associations. Its vulgar and brutal and sordid incidents are transformed into sharply focused images which have visual power and impact. Its characters have the cut-out neatness of collective folk types rather than human dimensions, yet they are credible figures within their realm. It is a genuine, popular ballad which touches the sentiment, if not the heart, and which persists in the memory like the original tune. This love tragedy of the corner saloon is choreographically quite remarkable. The movement pattern is simple and to the point and completely consistent in style throughout, halfway between burlesque and candid realism. Jerome Moross has composed an excellently fitting score and Paul DuPont's settings provide a suitable atmosphere.

In The Bells, which Miss Page created for the Monte Carlo ballet in 1946, she attempted a choreographic experiment eminently worth doing. The book is based on Edgar Allan Poe's poem, the music was written by Darius Milhaud and the setting and costumes were designed by Isamu Noguchi.

"The action of the ballet parallels the psychological development of Poe's poem. At the outset all is life, love and gaiety; but this mood is not allowed to endure. Disintegration and decay set in, until at the end there remains only that peculiar Beauty, divorced from Truth and the Moral Sense, which is found, according to Poe, in the 'pleasurable sadness' of the contemplation of death and destruction."

The Bells is a demanding work, original in approach, daring in execution and unlikely to become popular. Its abstract drama has strength and persuasive power which build up toward a terrifying climax; it is impossible to escape the grip of the mounting crescendo and the ultimate disintegration of the world of order. The ballet's general structure follows the poem; it has five clearly separated sections which progress from order to chaos. It is of minor importance how much the work is obligated to Poe, because it conveys meaning entirely in its own choreographic terms and its symbolism is completely transposed and abstracted in absolute dance movement.

And yet the visual impact of the symbols is perhaps greater than is justified by their inherent meaning, for there is at times a discrepancy between the magnitude of the poetic vision and the scope of its realization. In choreographic design and invention the ballet shows an uncompromising determination to reveal the full force of the drama. The second half of the work, with the growing threat of impending disaster and the appearance of the Ghouls is particularly convincing. The ballet is splendidly supported by Milhaud's compact and dramatic score, which has drive and intensity and a weird, haunting beauty. Noguchi designed an ingenious skeleton setting that seems a little thin for its function and, while some of his costumes are fascinating, those which represent bells are too literal in design and unbecoming to the human body.

Active as Miss Page is, her energies are not derived from exceptional physical resources, a restless temperament or burning ambition, but entirely from an irrepressible natural interest in the exciting diversity of life. It is, therefore, impossible to define her artistic achievements in any one formula. They change in content and style, in character and scope and even in medium in a completely pliant response to the dominating stimulus. During her formative years she was fortunate enough to have met Adolph Bolm who gave her a respect for the traditional ballet of the Imperial Academy, the experience of the Diaghilev-Fokine era and the incentive for progressive, experimental work. In the twenties the Chicago Allied Arts had an importance similar to that of the Ballet Society today and her connection with this vital little organization offered an aesthetic education such as few young artists in the American ballet got. During this time, Miss Page became thoroughly acquainted with the theatrical work and ideas of the Russian painter Nicholas Remisoff who later collaborated on most of her ballets. However, in her creative work, both as a concert dancer and as a choreographer, Miss Page was stimulated, rather than dominated, by these influences and she developed very definitely in her own way. Compositions like Frankie and Johnny or Hear ye! Hear ye! (Bentley-Stone Company, 1934) are of an uncompromising, dramatic directness without precedent or parallel on the ballet stage.

Every one of her creations has drama, whether it be a solo dance or a duet or a group composition, whether it be conceived in abstract, non-representational, symbolic terms, like Ravel's Bolero, which she called Iberian Monotone and The Bells, or presented as straight drama, like Guns and Castanets, which is actually the Carmen story. The basic structure of her work is determined by her acute sense of the theatre and of the need for dramatic accentuation. In her own words, she tends "to emphasize the drama or the dramatic purpose of the movement" and she does not hesitate to employ expressional or "modern" movement, if she feels that "the work will be more effective dramatically as a result." For the same reason, she has experimented with the use of speech in connection with the dance. She argues that "in our Western civilization the theatre arts have become so separated that a few spoken words in a ballet seem to be quite revolutionary." Granted the validity of the argument, the work has yet to be created that demonstrates a convincing fusion of the two media. At present Ruth Page is preparing a new work for the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, based on the colorful personality of Billy Sunday, in which she intends to blend speech, acting and pantomime with dancing. Whatever the result, one may be sure that it will be a stimulating and worthwhile experiment. America has very few native choreographers as yet. The contributions of so active, vital and provocative an artist as Ruth Page are helping to assert and formulate the character of the ballet in America.

Lincoln Kirstein I

THE FOUNDATIONS

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN, as scholar, patron, impresario and pamphleteer, is one of the key figures in the development of the American ballet. Within the last fifteen years he has written several important books and numerous articles; he has edited the only scholarly dance periodical—Dance Index, assembled a superb dance collection, founded a prominent ballet school and consecutively organized three fine performing companies—the American Ballet, the Ballet Caravan and the Ballet Society. He has lavished enough energy, initiative and ideas on the ballet for any normal lifetime; he is still young, independent and unpredictable and he still has not given half the measure of his vision and capacity.

Kirstein's attitude is emphatically individualistic and aristocratic. He derives his authority from the assertion of his personal convictions, which are at once categorical and catholic. It would be a dangerous authority if held by a man of less integrity and greater vanity, but Kirstein has proved his completely disinterested devotion to an idealistic task which will earn him neither wealth nor honors, neither popularity nor gratitude. The American Ballet and the Ballet Caravan are already monuments of the past, but the dancers and choreographers who were formed in those companies are still young and their high standard of achievement justifies the time, money and energy expended.

Kirstein's scholarly research, which was to lay the academic and theoretical foundations for his later accomplishments, was brought together in The Book of the Dance, published in 1935, which condensed an immense amount of material into a well-integrated, well-written compendium. During his years of study Kirstein assembled a collection of dance documents and dance books which he thought of as the nucleus of an American archives of the dance, similar to the Archives Internationales de la Danse in Paris. Kirstein offered his collection to any institution which would guarantee proper interest, space and care; there was no response to his generous offer and all his efforts to merge with any or all of the more important dance collections were in vain. The material was finally accepted by the Museum of Modern Art; since 1943 the collection is divided between the Museum of Modern Art and the Harvard Theatre Library, which has all the historical material on an extended loan. The Department of Theatre Arts at the Museum of Modern Art, devoted primarily to contemporary trends and achievements in the field, has continued and expanded his collection into a dance archives. Today it is the only large specialized public library and collection of the dance in this country offering adequate facilities for research and exhibition. It is also the only official agency equipped for international exchange with corresponding institutions in Paris, London and Amsterdam.

The foundation of a dance school was Kirstein's next undertaking, for if his vision of ballet as an American art were to be realized, it had to be proved that America could produce dancers as good as those of Europe not only in technique, but in progressive interests.

With Edward M. M. Warburg, Kirstein opened the School of American Ballet in January 1934. What distinguished Kirstein's venture from similar and older institutions was the underlying spirit of its organization, an awareness of specific problems never before clearly realized, formulated and tackled. An early announcement said: "The School is not a mere mechanism designed for the training of a given number of students of balletic dancing. It is an institution founded on an ancient and still lively tradition. Its aim is to preserve and further the tradition of classical theatrical dancing in order to provide adequate material for the growth of a new national art in America." Such affirmative language had not been heard before in the American dance world. Until that time ballet was "Russian"; it was an imported, highly valued commodity, as alien in origin and flavor as caviar and vodka.

Today we know that the first essential requirement of Kirstein's ambitious dream has come true magnificently. He proudly stated in the 1946 announcement of the Ballet Society: "Americans have demonstrated an inexhaustible power to create classic dancers who perform with a brilliance rivaling the most distinguished foreign artists." This artistic competence is the more gratifying because it is not limited to exceptional or isolated cases, but applies generally to our dancers in consecutive generations.

Although firmly determined to establish model standards, Kirstein did not map his school's program along esoteric lines. He conceived of a national art which would reach deeply into the richly varied sources of the nation. He was convinced that a vast store of anonymous talent was waiting to be discovered and formed.

The task ahead was immense. It could not be accomplished overnight. Yet Kirstein anticipated the peculiar problem "Americans are impatient," he said, "due increasingly to the pressure of economic insecurity; and time, more than almost any other secondary ingredient, is necessary for the development of any able artist." This stress on length of time, when the usual ballet-school announcement promised a maximum of proficiency in a minimum of time, was a reassuring indication of true professional honesty. Kirstein realized at the start that the future of classic theatrical dancing depended on a long range educational policy of the widest scope, designed to make the latent national qualities conscious, articulate and visible. When the school opened in Isadora Duncan's former studio it was after many years of intellectual preparation and after many months of ceaseless, sometimes dramatic efforts to secure the collaboration of George Balanchine.

As an "exponent of the purest contemporary ballet style," Balanchine appeared to Lincoln Kirstein "an inexhaustible source of information." And it is perfectly evident why Kirstein made every conceivable effort to win Balanchine as a teacher, ballet master and choreographer for the projected American Ballet Company. For the school was the means toward an end, the severe training ground for a permanent performing company which was to grow coincidentally with the progress of the students. It was able to offer the students a specific and concrete objective worth working for and guarantee a constant supply of new performers for the projected company.

The Producing Company of the School of American Ballet presented its first program at the Avery Memorial Theatre, Hartford, Connecticut, in December 1934. George Balanchine was ballet master, artistic director and choreographer; Edward M. M. Warburg was director. The program consisted of four ballets, all unknown in America: Mozartiana, Transcendence, Serenade and Alma Mater; for the spring season in New York Les Songes and Reminiscence were added. At first glance this program seems an odd statement of faith in native creative capacities since only Alma Mater was, strictly speaking, an American creation; Transcendence avoided any specific definition and three of the ballets were revivals from Balanchine's Ballets 1933 in Paris. Consequently the critics received the company with mixed feelings; while willing to concede its verve, vitality and fine accurate performing technique and to commend the superb choreography, they were grieved and as dull and inept as the performing style in opera, required "freshness, youth and novelty." But today it is difficult to understand how either group could have entertained such innocent illusions. There never was a basis for common aesthetic understanding between progressive ideas in art expression and the familiar, obsolete concept of opera presentation, anxiously preserved in the name of tradition. While Kirstein states that "everything proceeded on our part with a fatal and precipitate enthusiasm," it may be said that the Metropolitan proceeded with caution and without any clear conception of what they wanted or expected.

Despite increasing difficulties, the American Ballet, with Balanchine as choreographer, staged an imposing number of opera ballets for La Gioconda, Mignon, Aida, La Traviata, and La Juive, and several independent ballets, Mozartiana, Serenade, Reminiscence, an arrangement to Strauss's Fledermaus music, The Bat, and William Dollar's first choreographic venture, Classic Ballet (Chopin's Piano Concerto in F-Minor). This novelty, although noticeably derived in style from Balanchine, showed a promising talent, excellent craftsmanship and a fine gift for classical choreography. But the company was given little opportunity to prepare an independent repertory, the Metropolitan management claiming it could not afford the cost of extra rehearsals. The situation was distressing and unsatisfactory to all concerned, including the public and the critics. Sometime later Walter Ware took the trouble to investigate the reasons for the failure of the attempted collaboration in an interview with Edward Johnson which appeared in The American Dancer for September 1938. Mr. Johnson's account sounds like a belated and polite justification. It appeared that the main requirements for a good opera ballet were modesty, unobtrusiveness and respect for "tradition." Furthermore, it was unequivocally stated that "innovations" do not belong in opera, an attitude which already had been made clear in the Metropolitan Opera's general artistic policy. Balanchine, on the other hand, contended flatly that "the tradition of ballet at the Metropolitan is bad ballet," which was a matter of common knowledge and concern. The very engagement of Balanchine and the American Ballet had been an indication of good intentions on the part of the opera management. But, as Balanchine remarked about Edward Johnson, "he is an artist and could do fine things, but he has no wings."

The inevitable happened. In the spring season of 1936 Balanchine staged Gluck's Orpheus with the haunting décor and magnificent costumes of Pavel Tchelitchew. This was the coup de grace for the American Ballet. As Kirstein relates in Blast at

Ballet: "We were, naturally, all eager to put into immediate action all our theatrical ideas we had developed from Diaghilev's day to our own tenure at the Metropolitan, concerning the proper presentation of lyric drama. These ideas were in essence revolutionary and hence unsuitable for the Metropolitan. The Metropolitan is scarcely the place for experiment, even in an 'experimental' spring season. We knew that at the time, but there was little enough to lose and everything to gain by going ahead."

Deliberately the American Ballet threw all its enthusiasm and resources into the final offensive, determined to perish with honor. As Kirstein said, "It was by way of a reckless manifesto." Orpheus was indeed conceived and designed as an uncompromising summary of several years of consistent artistic endeavor, as a conclusive statement of essential artistic principles and as a supreme test for the artistic and technical capacities of the dancers. When Kirstein called the actual production of Orpheus "a complete failure" he excepted "the forty dancers who performed it as a conscious dream" and his bitter resignation was mingled with legitimate pride at the splendid achievement of his company. The production of Orpheus was torn to pieces by reviewers and public. But the disagreement was on essentially different issues. The Metropolitan defended a well-established tradition of performing opera, confirmed and sanctioned by continuous success. The powerful position of operatic leadership it assumed had never been seriously challenged; nobody had taken the trouble to evaluate its cultural contribution. Balanchine's Orpheus might have passed as an experimental ballet; as a revolutionary concept of opera it was an implied attack on the Metropolitan's prestige.

Nevertheless the American Ballet returned to the opera in the fall of 1936, although merely on sufferance. In order to revive interest in the ballet and, in Kirstein's words, "to establish the American Ballet once and for all as a major institution in the American theatre," Balanchine prepared a Stravinsky festival for the spring of 1937 with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra and the composer as conductor. For many years there had been a deep friendship and mutual admiration between the composer and the choreographer, as the results of their collaborations showed; the Stravinsky festival was a brilliant success. Three works were performed: Apollon Musagète, Le Baiser de la Fée and Jeu de Cartes.

Apollon Musagète (Book: Igor Stravinsky. Music: Igor Stravinsky. Settings and Costumes: Stewart Cheney) was not new to the American audience. Commissioned by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, it had been performed in 1928 at the Cham-as dull and inept as the performing style in opera, requiring "freshness, youth and novelty." But today it is difficult to understand how either group could have entertained such innocent illusions. There never was a basis for common aesthetic understanding between progressive ideas in art expression and the familiar, obsolete concept of opera presentation, anxiously preserved in the name of tradition. While Kirstein states that "everything proceeded on our part with a fatal and precipitous enthusiasm," it may be said that the Metropolitan proceeded with caution and without any clear conception of what they wanted or expected.

Despite increasing difficulties, the American Ballet, with Balanchine as choreographer, staged an imposing number of opera ballets for La Gioconda, Mignon, Aida, La Traviata, and La Juive, and several independent ballets, Mozartiana, Serenade, Reminiscence, an arrangement to Strauss's Fledermaus music, The Bat, and William Dollar's first choreographic venture, Classic Ballet (Chopin's Piano Concerto in F-Minor). This novelty, although noticeably derived in style from Balanchine, showed a promising talent, excellent craftsmanship and a fine gift for classical choreography. But the company was given little opportunity to prepare an independent repertoire, the Metropolitan management claiming it could not afford the cost of extra rehearsals. The situation was distressing and unsatisfactory to all concerned, including the public and the critics. Sometime later Walter Ware took the trouble to investigate the reasons for the failure of the attempted collaboration in an interview with Edward Johnson which appeared in The American Dancer for September 1938. Mr. Johnson's account sounds like a belated and polite justification. It appeared that the main requirements for a good opera ballet were modesty, unobtrusiveness and respect for "tradition." Furthermore, it was unequivocally stated that "innovations" do not belong in opera, an attitude which already had been made clear in the Metropolitan Opera's general artistic policy. Balanchine, on the other hand, contended flatly that "the tradition of ballet at the Metropolitan is bad ballet," which was a matter of common knowledge and concern. The very engagement of Balanchine and the American Ballet had been an indication of good intentions on the part of the opera management. But, as Balanchine remarked about Edward Johnson, "he is an artist and could do fine things, but he has no wings."

The inevitable happened. In the spring season of 1936 Balanchine staged Gluck's Orpheus with the haunting décor and magnificent costumes of Pavel Tchelitchew. This was the cor de grace for the American Ballet. As Kirstein relates in Blast

ballet: "We were, naturally, all eager to put into immediate action all our theatrical ideas we had developed from Diaghilev's day to our own tenure at the Metropolitan, concerning the proper presentation of lyric drama. These ideas were in essence revolutionary and hence unsuitable for the Metropolitan. The Metropolitan is scarcely the place for experiment, even in an 'experimental' spring season. We knew that at the time, but there was little enough to lose and everything to gain by going ahead."

Deliberately the American Ballet threw all its enthusiasm and resources into the final offensive, determined to perish with honor. As Kirstein said, "It was by way of a reckless manifesto." Orpheus was indeed conceived and designed as an uncompromising summary of several years of consistent artistic endeavor, as a conclusive statement of essential artistic principles and as a supreme test for the artistic and technical capacities of the dancers. When Kirstein called the actual production of Orpheus "a complete failure" he excepted "the forty dancers who performed it as a conscious dream" and his bitter resignation was mingled with legitimate pride at the splendid achievement of his company. The production of Orpheus was torn to pieces by reviewers and public. But the disagreement was on essentially different issues. The Metropolitan defended a well-established tradition of performing opera, confirmed and sanctioned by continuous success. The powerful position of operatic leadership it assumed had never been seriously challenged; nobody had taken the trouble to evaluate its cultural contribution. Balanchine's Orpheus might have passed as an experimental ballet; as a revolutionary concept of opera it was an implied attack on the Metropolitan's prestige.

Nevertheless the American Ballet returned to the opera in the fall of 1936, although merely on sufferance. In order to revive interest in the ballet and, in Kirstein's words, "to establish the American Ballet once and for all as a major institution in the American theatre," Balanchine prepared a Strawinsky Festival for the spring of 1937 with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra and the composer as conductor. For many years there had been a deep friendship and mutual admiration between the composer and the choreographer, as the results of their collaborations showed; the Strawinsky festival was a brilliant success. Three works were performed: Apollon Musagète, Le Baiser de la Fée and Jeu de Cartes.

Apollon Musagète (Book: Igor Strawinsky. Music: Igor Strawinsky. Settings and Costumes: Stewart Chaney) was not new to the American audience. Commissioned by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, it had been performed in 1928 at the Cham-

as dull and inept as the performing style in opera, required "freshness, youth and novelty." But today it is difficult to understand how either group could have entertained such innocent illusions. There never was a basis for common aesthetic understanding between progressive ideas in art expression and the familiar, obsolete concept of opera presentation, anxiously preserved in the name of tradition. While Kirstein states that "everything proceeded on our part with a fatal and precipitate enthusiasm," it may be said that the Metropolitan proceeded with caution and without any clear conception of what they wanted or expected.

Despite increasing difficulties, the American Ballet, with Balanchine as choreographer, staged an imposing number of opera ballets for La Gioconda, Mignon, Aida, La Traviata, and La Juive, and several independent ballets, Mozartiana, Serenade, Reminiscence, an arrangement to Strauss's Fledermaus music, The Bat, and William Dollar's first choreographic venture, Classic Ballet (Chopin's Piano Concerto in F-Minor). This novelty, although noticeably derived in style from Balanchine, showed a promising talent, excellent craftsmanship and a fine gift for classical choreography. But the company was given little opportunity to prepare an independent repertory, the Metropolitan management claiming it could not afford the cost of extra rehearsals. The situation was distressing and unsatisfactory to all concerned, including the public and the critics. Sometime later Walter Ware took the trouble to investigate the reasons for the failure of the attempted collaboration in an interview with Edward Johnson which appeared in The American Dancer for September 1938. Mr. Johnson's account sounds like a belated and polite justification. It appeared that the main requirements for a good opera ballet were modesty, unobtrusiveness and respect for "tradition." Furthermore, it was unequivocally stated that "innovations" do not belong in opera, an attitude which already had been made clear in the Metropolitan Opera's general artistic policy. Balanchine, on the other hand, contended flatly that "the tradition of ballet at the Metropolitan is bad ballet," which was a matter of common knowledge and concern. The very engagement of Balanchine and the American Ballet had been an indication of good intentions on the part of the opera management. But, as Balanchine remarked about Edward Johnson, "he is an artist and could do fine things, but he has no wings."

The inevitable happened. In the spring season of 1936 Balanchine staged Gluck's Orpheus with the haunting décor and magnificent costumes of Pavel Tchelitchew. This was the coup de grace for the American Ballet. As Kirstein relates in Blast at

Ballet: "We were, naturally, all eager to put into immediate action all our theatrical ideas we had developed from Diaghilev's day to our own tenure at the Metropolitan, concerning the proper presentation of lyric drama. These ideas were in essence revolutionary and hence unsuitable for the Metropolitan. The Metropolitan is scarcely the place for experiment, even in an 'experimental' spring season. We knew that at the time, but there was little enough to lose and everything to gain by going ahead."

Deliberately the American Ballet threw all its enthusiasm and resources into the final offensive, determined to perish with honor. As Kirstein said, "It was by way of a reckless manifesto." Orpheus was indeed conceived and designed as an uncompromising summary of several years of consistent artistic endeavor, as a conclusive statement of essential artistic principles and as a supreme test for the artistic and technical capacities of the dancers. When Kirstein called the actual production of Orpheus "a complete failure" he excepted "the forty dancers who performed it as a conscious dream" and his bitter resignation was mingled with legitimate pride at the splendid achievement of his company. The production of Orpheus was torn to pieces by reviewers and public. But the disagreement was on essentially different issues. The Metropolitan defended a well-established tradition of performing opera, confirmed and sanctioned by continuous success. The powerful position of operatic leadership it assumed had never been seriously challenged; nobody had taken the trouble to evaluate its cultural contribution. Balanchine's Orpheus might have passed as an experimental ballet; as a revolutionary concept of opera it was an implied attack on the Metropolitan's prestige.

Nevertheless the American Ballet returned to the opera in the fall of 1936, although merely on sufferance. In order to revive interest in the ballet and, in Kirstein's words, "to establish the American Ballet once and for all as a major institution in the American theatre," Balanchine prepared a Strawinsky festival for the spring of 1937 with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra and the composer as conductor. For many years there had been a deep friendship and mutual admiration between the composer and the choreographer, as the results of their collaborations showed; the Strawinsky festival was a brilliant success. Three works were performed: Apollon Musagète, Le Baiser de la Fée and Jeu de Cartes.

Apollon Musagète (Book: Igor Strawinsky. Music: Igor Strawinsky. Settings and Costumes: Stewart Chaney) was not new to the American audience. Commissioned by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, it had been performed in 1928 at the Chamber Music Festival, in Washington, D. C., with Adolph Bolm as choreographer and dancer of the title role. Judging by contemporary accounts it was not a memorable performance. Stravinsky later revised the score for Diaghilev and Balanchine. Of the many famous Stravinsky ballets this is one on which opinions disagreed most strikingly. Some responsible critics dismissed it as "silly and arty," while others considered it Balanchine's "masterpiece." It never was popular and its intimate and subtle qualities make it impossible to discuss without allowing for personal taste. Stravinsky had composed the score specifically for a ballet in the academic medium; Balanchine presented a superb interpretation of Stravinsky's diaphanous score as a lyrical drama in the classical style. The intricate relationships between Apollo and the Muses are established and developed in a slow crescendo with the clarity and discipline of spiritual geometry. In the sense that all poetry arranges emotions and meanings in an invisible pattern of interdependent measurements, Apollon is immensely poetic. (Edwin Dent has written a penetrating analysis of the work which is recommended to the reader.)

The ballet calls for only four dancers and is very demanding on those dancers, requiring absolute mastery of the classical style. The performance at the Metropolitan, brilliantly staged, was very successful. In Apollon Lew Christensen confirmed what he had promised in Orpheus: that in him America had a magnificent classical dancer, with flawless technique and a sureness of noble style.

Le Baiser de la Fée (Book: Igor Stravinsky. Music: Igor Stravinsky. Settings and Costumes: Alice Halicka) had been performed in 1928 in Paris with choreography by Bronislava Nijinska for the Ida Rubinstein Ballet, at the Teatro Colon in Buenos Aires in 1933 and with choreography by Frederic Ashton for the Sadler's Wells Ballet in London in 1935. The plot is based on a story by Hans Christian Andersen and contains the carelessly irrational and brutal drama of a typical fairy tale. As an homage to Petipa in its choreography and to Tchaikowsky in its music, the ballet evokes the Mariinsky Theatre tradition of Balanchine's Russian past and for this very reason it proves how far removed Balanchine's academic style is from the school of Petipa and Ivanov. While everything seems historically right and familiar, it assumes a strange transformation, a twist toward sophistication which implies a subtle comment on the genre. It indicates in no way an ironical or patronizing attitude but rather the generous and mature recognition of an old debt of gratitude. The ballet has a wonderfully sustained atmosphere of transcendental drama, enhanced by nostalgic charms reminiscent of the early romantic era. In choreographic design the work is brilliant and beautiful, with an invention which is at all times clear, direct and fast without ever breaking the delicate spell of a strange enchantment. It was immaculately performed by the young dancers of the American ballet, particularly the tender and poignant pas de deux between The Girl and Her Fiancé danced by Giselle Caccialanza and William Dollar.

Jeu de Cartes—also The Card Game, or Poker Game—has book by Strawinsky and M. Malieff, music by Igor Strawinsky and setting and costumes by Irene Sharaff. It has little substance and less meaning and contains neither poetry, nor drama, nor any warm human quality. In that respect it is very different from Coppelia and Petrouchka in which the animated figure assumes a droll or pathetic life. The program gives the following excerpt from the libretto:

The characters in this ballet are the chief cards in a game of poker, fought out between several players on the green cloth of a card room. At each deal the situation is complicated by the endless tricks of the perfidious Joker. During the first deal, one of the players drops out but the other two remain with even "straights." Although one holds the Joker, he is unable to upset the balance of power. In the second deal, the hand that holds the Joker is victorious, thanks to four Aces who, sweeping all before them, beat four Queens. Now comes the third deal. The situation becomes more and more tense. This time it is a question of a struggle between three "flushes." Although at first victorious over one adversary, the Joker, strutting at the head of a sequence of Spades, is beaten by a "Royal Flush" in Hearts. This puts an end to his nonsense and knavery.

Jeu de Cartes is rigid, formal and two-dimensional like playing-card figures and it was danced with the intelligence, the versatility, the deliberation and the well-mannered discipline of a card game in good company. Balanchine's choreography here followed the composer's directions and score more literally than usual; he achieved a work of stunning precision and elegant clipped humor. However, in the parallel evolution of the Strawinsky-Balanchine ballet cooperation Jeu de Cartes occupies a significant position because it indicates a break with the Tchaikovsky-Petipa tradition, so deliberately demonstrated in Baiser de la Fée. Musically as well as choreographically Jeu de Cartes reveals a sharp tightening of style that is new in both the composer's and the choreographer's work. Jazz elements in the score and musical comedy elements in the dance accentuate and exaggerate the staccato rhythm of the composition. The general tendency of stressing the rhythmical structure, as against the melodic line, remains and from the is frequently repeated until it crystallizes in a definite style. Danses Concertantes, first presented in 1944, is a refined, abstract version of Jeu de Cartes.

Unfortunately, the success of the Strawinsky Festival was of little avail as far as the American Ballet was concerned. The three Strawinsky ballets were not even taken into the regular Metropolitan repertory, with the exception of two performances of Apollon, again because the management refused additional rehearsals. Eventually, after three miserable years, the unfortunate collaboration between the Metropolitan and the American Ballet ended. But, as Merle Armitage remarks in his book, Dance Memoranda, "Kirstein's failures have been magnificent. The very lack of success which his American Ballet enjoyed in its association with the Metropolitan Opera is its most telling Medal of Merit."

Lincoln Kirstein II

THE PERFORMANCE

EVEN BEFORE the disbanding of the American Ballet, Kirstein had begun to organize another ensemble, partly with dancers recruited from the American Ballet and partly with students from the School. This new company was called The Ballet Caravan. Although he had the dancers, Kirstein had no repertory and not one choreographer of Balanchine's stature, background and practice. This responsibility rested with three relatively inexperienced young Americans: Eugene Loring, Lew Christensen and William Dollar. In an amazingly short time they created a new repertory of both classic and character ballets which proved the basic soundness of Kirstein's impulsive optimism. Eugene Loring created Billy the Kid, City Portrait and Yankee Clipper; Lew Christensen choreographed Filling Station, Pocahontas, Encounter, Charade and Pastorela; William Dollar contributed Promenade and Air and Variations.

Eugene Loring was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. He began his career as an actor, won a fellowship in the School of American Ballet and had danced in the American Ballet as well as in the Fokine Ballet during 1934-1935.

Billy the Kid, a character ballet in one act, has survived as a genuine American classic. It was produced in 1938, with book by Lincoln Kirstein, music by Aaron Copland and décor and costumes by Jared French. Billy the Kid marks the beginning of American ballet and it fulfilled generously all the promises Lincoln Kirstein had made in pioneering for a native ballet. The young Eugene Loring emerged at once as one of our most talented choreographers. Librettist, composer, designer and dancers all contributed an essential part toward the creation of a truly representative American dance work. In particular Aaron Copland's eminently fitting, theatrical score was a distinguished composition, combining motifs of popular songs with a rich, easily flowing invention.

City Portrait, called a ballet-document in one act, with book by Lincoln Kirstein, music by Henry Brant and costumes by Forrest Thayer, Jr., was an intense little drama which gave further indication of Loring's talent. It was, as the program pointed out, an attempt to use "the material of everyday life.

. . . Eugene Loring has attempted to give a lyric pattern to colloquial gesture. Henry Brant has invented a score full of contemporary rhythm of city sounds indoors and out and Forrest Thayer, Jr. has found an unsuspected beauty in the banal clothes." Revised and improved, City Portrait was later included in the Dance Players' repertory.

Lew Christensen, the ballet master of the Ballet Caravan, began his stage career in 1927 in a vaudeville act with his two brothers. He joined the American Ballet at its foundation and his magnificent stage presence, his noble style, his vast stage experience and his prodigious technique distinguished him immediately as an outstanding classical dancer.

Filling Station, a ballet-document in one act, with book by Lincoln Kirstein, music by Virgil Thomson, choreography by Lew Christensen and décor and costumes by Paul Cadmus, deserves to be rescued from oblivion for the significance of its attempt as well as for its merits. The program synopsis reads:

America has so many kinds of people in so many parts of the country, with so many local stories, that it is difficult to find a contemporary fable to fit a modern Hero. But everyone who has ridden in an automobile recognizes the typical, self-reliant, resourceful and courteous Filling Station Mechanic as a friend indeed. . . . We call him Mac. He keeps his washroom spick and span. The chromium on his gaspumps gleams. His road-maps are neatly stacked to be given away on request. His friends are two truck-drivers, Roy and Ray, chased by a State Trooper who warns them against speeding and overloading. A distressed Motorist inquires the route he has lost. His wife and children burden him down with demonstrations of domestic bliss. A rich young couple from the country club stagger in and turn the filling station into a dance-hall. A nervous gangster finds himself involved in murder. Mac summons the State Trooper. The station is emptied and Mac, finding himself alone again, spreads his tabloid and turns on his radio, waiting for whatever will turn up next.

Filling Station demonstrated that the ballet was capable of furnishing first-rate theatrical entertainment without relinquishing its claim to balletic dignity. If the underlying realism was American, so was the tender and humorous detachment in dealing with life's incidents. It was no more accurate a portrayal of life in America than are the Sunday funny-papers, yet it was just as valid and nearly as familiar. One first-night reviewer called the ballet "a completely unified expression of American life in its present tempo." It may not have been very substantial but it was more than just good fun. Virgil Thomson's witty and elegant score and Paul Cadmus's effective backdrop and comic-strip costumes contributed greatly to its success.

His work is characterized throughout by flawless craftsmanship which testifies to his long years of intensive training and varied stage practice. At the very beginning of his dancing career his artistic personality was clearly defined and, to use the theatrical term, projected easily. As soon as he was given adequate opportunity he distinguished himself by an exceptional technical command, fine muscular grace and a sure grasp of style. The stylistic precision of his performance was never purely mechanical, but inspired and emotionally intense and honest. This excellent artistic equipment accounts for the professional finish of all his choreographic endeavors, including the less successful ones. The ballet he choreographed to Chopin's F Minor Piano Concerto, his first, although heavily influenced by Balanchine, preserved an imaginative perspective truly surprising considering his youth. He made intelligent, creative use of the essentials of Balanchine's style which Edwin Denby defined in this very context as "mass, direction, clarity and above all swiftness . . . that gives physical exhilaration to the whole." When the ballet was restaged as Constantia for the Ballet International in 1944 it had preserved and confirmed its qualities—the clarity of design, the exactness of gesture, the transparency of groupings and the swift changes. Promenade, set to Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales, was less fortunate, possibly because it was hampered by unnecessary story content and such arbitrary characterizations as "the First Consul as Satyr and the Ladies of Josephine's Court as Nymphs, etc." and never quite reached a visual equivalent to the drive and breadth of the score. Air and Variations, a classic ballet to Bach's Goldberg Variations, was a laudable and honest attempt to "equal the variety, nobility and large design" of the music. Certainly Dollar would be capable today of giving this work the maturity, simple nobility and sustained line it was lacking then. A Thousand Times Neigh was a virtuoso production in content, choreographic originality and mechanical accomplishment. The surprising use of academic steps was quite successful and the whole work turned out as a highly entertaining, witty piece; to quote John Martin, "It had far more style and taste than such an assignment would seem to allow." Juke Box was an unpretentious bit of jazz ballet, good-humored, exuberant and slight.

The pioneer work in the use of American themes in Ballet Caravan ballets was a demonstration of Kirstein's grasp of essentials and his gift for poetic interpretation. The simplicity with which the American myths were presented was deceptive, for actually they are as significant as the legends of the Old World which supplied so many themes to the European ballet.

repertories. American folklore contains a wealth of lyric and dramatic elements which are eminently theatrical and danceable. The limitations involved in the use of realistic subject matter were in one way an advantage, for they determined a characteristic style of movement, directly derived from the familiar content and context of American life. The style was infinitely more intimate than the detached Russian manner; it eliminated the footlights, as it were, and spectators in every American audience delighted in the experience of recognition and participation. This trend is continued in such ballets as Jerome Robbins's Fancy Free and Michael Kidd's On Stage!

The Ballet Caravan was modest in size, comparable to a chamber ensemble. Although it did not last long as an active company, the few years of exacting work contributed invaluable knowledge and experience; the number of outstanding native dancers who have come out of the School of American Ballet and the Ballet Caravan is the most telling confirmation of Kirstein's sound concepts and discriminating choice. As a matter of principle, every dancer in the Ballet Caravan had to be a graduate of the School of American Ballet. The company included Fernando Alonso, Todd Bolender, Lew Christensen, Fred Danieli, William Dollar, Erick Hawkins (who left the ballet eventually to join Martha Graham's company as dancer and choreographer), Michael Kidd, Eugene Loring, Marie-Jeanne as ballerina and Alieia Alonso, Ruthanna Boris, Gisella Caccialanza, Annabel Lyon and others who have become prominent since.

The Ballet Caravan toured extensively from 1936 to 1939 and presented the Ford Ballet, A Thousand Times Neigh, at the New York World's Fair. In 1941 the company was temporarily reorganized and combined with the remnants of the late American Ballet for a good-will tour through Latin America for the State Department. The company was again called The American Ballet, with Lincoln Kirstein as director general, George Balanchine as director of choreography, Emanuel Balaban as musical director and Lew Christensen as ballet master. The principal dancers were Gisella Caccialanza, Lorna London, Marie-Jeanne, Marjorie Moore, Mary Jane Shea, Olga Suarez, Beatrice Tompkins, Lew Christensen, Fred Danieli, William Dollar and Nicolas Magallanes. The repertory kept a fine balance between dramatic and narrative ballets and some of Balanchine's most noteworthy classical creations; it included: Juke Box (Wilder-Dollar), Pastorela (Bowles-Christensen), The Bat (Strauss-Balanchine), Billy the Kid (Copland-Loring), Charade (Rittman-Christensen), Errante (Schubert-Balanchine), Serenade (Tchaikowsky-Balanchine), Apollon

Musagète (Strawinsky-Balanchine), Ballet Imperial (Tchaikowsky-Balanchine) and Concerto Barocco (Bach-Balanchine). At the conclusion of this tour, which visited twelve countries in seven months, the company was definitely disbanded.

The war interrupted all Lincoln Kirstein's Ballet activities, with the exception of the School, which was continued under Balanchine's direction. But immediately after his discharge from the army Kirstein started intensive preparation for the Ballet Society, "a non-profit membership organization for the encouragement of the lyric theatre by the production of new works." In announcing the Ballet Society in 1946 Kirstein stated, "Since ballet in the United States is relatively new, our interest has been primarily in the revival of productions already famous or the creation of works based on national themes. Now, with the close of a second world war, broader directions are possible and desirable." This statement is interesting for two reasons: first, because it signifies the deliberate close of the self-consciously "American" phase; second, because it promises an exhaustive evaluation of our creative resources. The first is clearly demonstrated in the Ballet Society programs. The second may be summed up tentatively in Edwin Denby's prediction that the Ballet Society "may well, after several years of trial and error, turn out to have been the foundation of the sensibly organized, exciting American ballet company we need now so badly."

Announcing the artistic policy of the new organization, Kirstein said, "The Ballet Society will present a completely new repertory, consisting of ballets, ballet-opera and other lyric forms. Each will have the planned collaboration of independent easel painters, progressive choreographers and musicians, employing the full use of advance-guard ideas, methods and materials." This policy is, of course, the formula of the later Diaghilev period. In adopting artistic principles which he himself had analyzed in his essay on Diaghilev, Kirstein reaffirms his considered belief in their aesthetic soundness. But, forewarned by Diaghilev's experience, Kirstein has provided his organization with a school. Indeed, the performing company of the Ballet Society is unique in this country in that it is based on the solid foundation of an excellent school. All dancers and several choreographers in the ensemble are students and graduates of the School of American Ballet and Balanchine and Kirstein share responsibility both for the School and the Society.

The scope of the Ballet Society is illustrated in a six-point program, which seems destined to fill very real needs:

1. Presentation of new theatre pieces, including ballet, ballet opera and chamber opera, either commissioned by the Ballet Society or unfamiliar to the American public as well as individual concert dancers. 2. Cooperation with other educational and cultural institutions to enable the production of performances, exhibitions and publications difficult to accomplish alone. 3. Publication of books, prints and articles which will award to the dance a serious and consistent attention long enjoyed by painting, sculpture, architecture and music. 4. Production and circulation of ballet companies, individual dancers and national dances as well as experimental films using dance as a main element. 5. Publication of record albums of music used in the performances of the Ballet Society with photographic documentation and full program notes. 6. Awards of fellowships to enable talented young dancers and choreographers to work by themselves or with groups of dancers to develop technically and professionally.

At this writing the Ballet Society has completed its first season. The greatest interest in its offerings was in their absolute newness rather than in provocative assertions of an avant-garde or experimental character. This moderation, whether intentional or accidental, gave the performing company time to grow into a coherent ensemble before having to cope with more unusual or exacting assignments. The standard of balletic proficiency was remarkably high although the whole corps de ballet and some of the soloists were students without previous stage experience. Outstanding among the male soloists were Todd Bolender, Lew Christensen, Fred Danieli, William Dollar, Francisco Moncion and John Taras and, among the girl soloists, Gisella Caccialanza, Mary Ellen Moylan, who is one of our most promising ballerinas, and a student, Tanaquil Le Clercq, who made a very impressive début. Despite the excellent dancing of qualified soloists, the prevailing impression was that of particularly fine amateur performances. This, although a valid observation, is irrelevant as a criticism; the Ballet Society is neither conceived nor equipped to compete with established professional companies. It is intended to provide a testing ground for students and young choreographers and a laboratory for non-commercial experimentation.

The creative contributions of the younger choreographers were generally disappointing, although judgment should be reserved until the company is better organized, integrated and trained. Unfortunately George Balanchine was commissioned to reorganize the Paris Opera ballet and had to leave in mid-season, which put unexpected strain and responsibility on the remaining choreographers. Before he left Balanchine created two fine ballets which remain the outstanding events of the first season: Divertimento and The Four Temperaments. Divertimento had the benefit of a wonderfully transparent, liquid score by the young composer Alexei Haieff, which was choreographed in Balanchine's purest style. At a swift but unhurried pace the ballet wove an intricate subtle pattern with the easy assurance of a superb improvisation. The Four Temperaments (Music: Paul Hindemith. Setting and costumes: Kurt Seligmann) was commissioned originally by Lincoln Kirstein and George Balanchine for the Latin American tour of the American Ballet in 1941. This production, then called The Cave of Sleep, did not materialize because the composer considered Tchelitchew's décor unsuited to the music. The idea of the score is based on a musical exposition of the four medieval temperaments. Balanchine's choreography was an audacious and thoroughly convincing interpretation of Paul Hindemith's magnificent music. The dance composition held a quality of contained power which was the exact visual counterpart of the profound and beautiful music. Balanchine himself felt that his dances "form a negative to Hindemith's positive plate." Kurt Seligmann's haunting décor and weird costumes seemed to be made of strangely animated amorphous matter and created an uneasy impression of being as real and alive as the dancers.

The Seasons (Music: John Cage. Choreography: Merce Cunningham. Setting and Costumes: Isamu Noguchi) was a well-balanced, fluid composition, delightfully danced and remarkable for the perfect dynamic and visual integration of music, movement, setting. Generally speaking, on both the musical and the decorative side the Ballet Society's program offered several interesting and distinguished creations, in particular Stravinsky's rarely performed Renard with exciting décor and costumes by Esteban Francés, who also designed Zodiac (scored by Rudi Reil and choreographed, unevenly but imaginatively, by Todd Bolcnder). The integration of stage design and costumes by Joan Junyer for Minotaur (Carter-Taras) was a fascinating experiment. William Dollar's Highland Fling (music, Stanley Bate; décor, David Ffolkes) was workmanlike and competent throughout, although it might gain by tightening. According to the program notes it "uses the double and parallel tradition of national folk-dances theatricalized, combined with the classic theatrical dance. Its plot combines elements of the Sylphide story in a new synthesis. It is neither a reconstruction nor a revival, but a contemporary ballet based on Romantic themes." This subject sounds promising enough, but the synthesis was not entirely successful, possibly because the folk-dance parts were weak. The Sylphides sequences, on the other hand, revealed a captivating beauty and a delicate poetic charm which seemed to prove that Dollar's real strength resides in abstract design in the classical tradition.

Whatever criticism has been voiced or might be suggested, the sum total of Ballet Society's activity has more than justified the immense efforts of Kirstein, Balanchine and their artistic collaborators.

There is no doubt of Kirstein's importance to the American ballet and it is significant that Kirstein, who has not revealed any creative ambitions of his own in the many organizations which he has founded and directed, has actually been the creative spirit in all of them. Each enterprise and activity has carried the unmistakable imprint of his personality and has reflected distinctive phases in the evolution of his principles and concepts. Each stage, seen in retrospect, has corresponded to a concrete need and fulfilled a real purpose: the Dance Archives, The Book of the Dance and Dance Index established historical foundations; the School of American Ballet was necessary as a technical basis; The American Ballet was a tool for Balanchine and the pure classical dance; Blast at Ballet was a polemic prelude to the launching of the Ballet Caravan. The Ballet Society, one may be sure, represents another logical step in the evolution of ballet in America.

Mr. Kirstein's own view of the future of the American ballet is expressed in this statement, written especially for this book:

As the twentieth century approaches 1950 it is easier to see where its main currents in the dance have led us. Perhaps not in a century had such a violent revolution taken place as with the emergence of the Diaghilev international seasons from 1909 to 1929. A decade later, their impact was still felt—but dissipated on the one hand by an insistence on fashionable, rather than creative easel-painting, and on the other by the use of music which was famous, rather than conceived as collaboration. This was the epoch of the "symphonic" ballet, scarcely an example of which is retained by the current repertory. During this time, there was the assertion of both English and American nationalism in the dance, a necessary historical development which is by no means a permanent genre. At the present, and for the next decade, we may expect instead of revolt and novelty, simply the creation of important works, along the lines that have re-emerged out of forty years of experiment. Standards of aristocratic aesthetic judgment and humanism of expression may continue to create a new classicism, which may one day seem directly to continue the line of Petipa and Ivanov, which was interrupted but not broken, by the impact of the Post-Impressionist and Cubist painters. As Fokine was the leader of the early period of exoticism and picturesque nationalism, and Massine defined the second period of theatricalized character-dancing and pantomime, Balanchine is responsible for an insistent interest in the classic dance for its own sake, with music as its ruling basis. Since 1926, it is he alone who has continued the line of tradition of the absolute ballet, which now, with the century half done, is seen to be the staple of our repertory and the school of the future.

The Ballet Theatre I

ANTONY TUDOR and AGNES DE MILLE

THE BALLET THEATRE was organized in 1939 by Richard Pleasant, a young man who had been on the executive staff of the Mordkin company. Its objectives were neither as radical as those of Lincoln Kirstein's earlier projects nor as conservative as those of the various Russian companies which had succeeded each other in the United States. Richard Pleasant's method and plan of action indicated a departure from previous ballet ventures. Firmly determined to avoid the mistakes of their successful competitors as well as those of their less fortunate predecessors, the organizers of the Ballet Theatre translated their idealistic plans into a realistic program.

They intended to compete in the major league and they knew that if the company were to survive it had to be able to meet any competitor, not only artistically but in regard to size and funds, personalities and glamour. Richard Pleasant believed that a ballet company should assume aesthetic responsibility, respect vital traditions and preserve significant masterpieces of every style, period and origin, just as an art museum does. But he also believed that a vigorous organization should be truly representative of contemporary trends and achievements; it should encourage and further modern artists, offer and promote stimulating and provocative creations and be independent enough to afford the risk of controversy and dissent. He believed, finally, that there was an enormous potential audience for the ballet if it could be reached and his whole project was conceived and prepared to attract the new public and, at the same time, interest the balletophiles. The new company was organized and advertised on a scale which recalled a three-ring circus. America's first Ballet Theatre was "staged by the greatest collaboration in ballet history" and comprised eleven choreographers, twenty principal dancers, fifteen soloists, a company of fifty-six, a Spanish unit of nineteen, a Negro unit of fourteen, eleven designers, three conductors and contributions by eighteen composers.

The Ballet Theatre gave its first performance at the Center Theatre in Rockefeller Center, New York, on January 11, 1940. The program offered Les Sylphides, The Great American Goof and Voices of Spring. The enormous house, which seats 3500, was full. The opening night was a brilliant success and the first New York season was equally brilliant. This instantaneous public acceptance proved the merits of the Ballet Theatre's policy and presentation and the audience's predisposition toward and the need for such a company. Apparently the Ballet Theatre had hit upon the right formula.

From the beginning the Ballet Theatre established itself as the representative American company and it has preserved this title of honor. Yet neither the original company, nor its choreographers and repertory were literally American. In commenting on the new company John Martin pointed out that "to have a ballet company of and by Americans is, of course, immensely important, but perhaps less fundamental to ultimate success than to have it for Americans."

Among the eleven original choreographers only Agnes de Mille and Eugene Loring, both of them young and comparatively unknown, were Americans, while the Russian choreographers included Fokine, Bolm and Mordkin. The other choreographers, soloists and the corps de ballet hailed from many lands. There was an inevitable contingent of Russians; Andrée Howard, Hugh Laing and Antony Tudor were English. But most of the large company was made up of the most promising young dancers available in this country. The disbanded Mordkin company contributed the remnants of its well-trained ensemble, among them, as prominent soloists, Lucia Chase, Karen Conrad, Viola Essen, Nina Stroganova, Dmitry Romanoff and Leon Varkas. The commercial failure of the Kirstein and Mordkin ventures had deprived a great many fine dancers of opportunities to prove their value and to gain experience. The Ballet Theatre offered them both on a large scale and demonstrated conclusively that there was sufficient technical and artistic ballet material in America to compare with the best.

With rare singleness of purpose and direction, the new company was sifted, organized, rehearsed and gradually shaped into a homogeneous coherent unit. When it appeared in public it had enough professional finish and artistic competence to convince the most skeptical. One glance at the initial repertory demonstrates that soloists and corps de ballet were submitted to a particularly difficult and exacting test; during the first season this super-company offered eighteen ballets: Adolph Bolm's Mechanical Ballet and Peter and the Wolf, Agnes de Mille's Obeah (Black Ritual), Anton Dolin's Giselle, Quintet and Swan Lake, José Fernandez's Goyescas, Michel Fokine's

Carnaval and Les Sylphides, Andrée Howard's Death and the Maiden and Lady into Fox, Eugene Loring's The Great American Goof, Mikhail Mordkin's Voices of Spring, Bronislava Nijinska's La Fille Mal Gardée, Yurek Shabalevski's Ode to Glory, Antony Tudor's Dark Elegies, Jardin aux Lilas and Judgment of Paris.

The signal success of the first season was Michel Fokine's Les Sylphides; its patent failure was Eugene Loring's American Goof. The acclaim of Les Sylphides confirmed emphatically the popularity of the ballet blanc; the American audience had learned to appreciate the charm and beauty of the pure classical danse d'école. That first-season performance of Les Sylphides was also memorable because it was the last authentic revival of a lyrical masterpiece which had suffered many inferior presentations before—and has since. Fokine conveyed his exquisite taste and style to a corps de ballet which responded like a perfect instrument and to young soloists who did some superb dancing. "Rehearsed every day for weeks by the author himself," writes Richard Pleasant, "old patterns blurred by decades of carelessness had become clear again. It was now evident that this best-known and most abused of ballets had been so placed (at the beginning of the very first program) by design: a challenge to immediate comparison." Here, indeed, the Ballet Theatre proved that its ambitious announcements had been fully justified, that the new company was artistically and technically qualified to compete, and to survive.

The same public, however, refused coldly to applaud the antics of the American Goof, although it would seem that subject and treatment had much to appeal to an American audience. The ballet, with book written by William Saroyan, promised, in its full title, A Number of Absurd and Poetic Events in the Life of the Great American Goof. These events happen indeed, but they fail to arouse genuine interest. Every character in the large cast is burdened with a heavy symbolism. The Goof is "the naïve white hope of the human race." The Dummy is "tradition and the ordinary," The Woman is "the bright potential," The Policeman is "orderly idiocy," Women are summarily "sex," Workers are "misfits." There is no objection to the author's thesis that "if ballet is to tell a story at all, it must tell a very fundamental story, and if it is to have characters at all, they must be aspects of human character in general." Precisely. But this ballet is not about anything general or fundamental, as Saroyan contends; it is rather the specific case of a particularly inept young man who has the misfortune of getting involved with some exceptionally unpleasant and obscure characters. Under the circumstances—as they appear on the stage—nobody can honestly blame the Goof for his constantly repeated intention to resign. However, despite its weakness and infantile philosophy, this work has a certain haunting quality and cannot be dismissed. The essential seriousness of its intentions, although it is considerably clearer in the introduction than in the dramatic action, demands respect. The theme proper is depressingly misanthropic and desolate; the world in which it materializes is “in reality a figment in a nightmare of an idiot. . . . What this ballet says is that you need six or seven thousand years to get this place out of the nightmare it’s in now,” which is a cheerless prospect, particularly considering that America had not yet entered the second world war when William Saroyan wrote his explanatory notes.

After having made these statements, Saroyan expects us to believe that “the Great American Goof is a nameless young man who is delighted to be alive, curious about all things, eager for understanding, full of affection, love, comedy, sorrow, anger and all the other things which are part of a man’s identity, excepting that strongest of all in him is affection for good.” He is not very convincing as a character who sets out “to change the world,” yet he is fairly credible as a young American who gets involved in absurd and poetic events. Actually Eugene Loring based his interpretation of the Goof on this piece of information, the only one that has any substance. He created a figure which was more clearly defined and much more real and alive than Saroyan’s pallid specter of incompetence. Loring’s concept of the Goof conveyed to the drama its supreme raison d’être, although this alone could not save it. The failure of the central character is mainly due to a forced sophistication which dilutes whatever blood and vigor the “nameless young man” may have had. The fate of this anonymous American is of no real consequence, either as a personal experience, or a symbolic one. Billy the Kid, Filling Station and Frankie and Johnny were far more moving stories, not merely because they had been derived from familiar and popular subject matter, but essentially because they had warmth and poetry and humor, because, as Robert Edmond Jones has said, they had a “fundamental relevance to the reality of American experience.”

The performance was outstanding in many respects. “an admirable and moving experience,” according to John Martin. Loring’s choreography actually amounted to the creation of a complete dance drama, because Saroyan’s ballet-play is all play and no ballet; essentially it neither requires nor suggests choreographic elaboration. That the ballet, in the actual production, conveyed a valid American quality, and that it assumed a contemporary relevance, was primarily owing to the concerted creative endeavor of the artistic collaborators: Eugène Loring, who had already proved his outstanding gifts with Billy the Kid; Henry Brant, the composer of City Portrait, who wrote a fine, dramatic score; Boris Aronson, the designer, who solved the extremely difficult scenic problems with an ingenious use of projected décor; and the soloists and corps de ballet who performed superbly. The unique importance of Saroyan's work resides in the fact that it introduced a "new American form," as the author points out. It is a "ballet-play" in which dance and speech are combined and it anticipated by many years a recent trend. The Great American Goof was a splendid failure—an opportunity to produce a significant contemporary, native ballet that was wasted. But it was also a large-scale experiment on the American ballet stage that showed daring, imagination and vision.

In the same season, 1940, Ballet Theatre presented Obeah (Black Ritual), another novelty and in many ways an even more courageous experiment than The Great American Goof. This was Agnes de Mille's first major choreographic composition and it turned out to be mature, beautiful and moving. It was set to Darius Milhaud's sharp, jazzy, thrilling score for La Création du Monde which had preserved all its spirit since its first presentation by the Ballets Suédois in 1923. Nicholas de Molas designed two settings with a fine sense of space and atmosphere, quite different from the violent cubist décor which Léger had done for the Paris performance two decades before. The change in style was profound and significant. Jean Borlin's choreography had created striking pictorial effects; Miss de Mille's interpretation conveyed an indefinable dramatic excitement with a minimum of theatrical means. Without introducing any literal ethnological references, she succeeded in "projecting the psychological atmosphere of a primitive community during the performance of austere and vital ceremonies." She made beautiful and intelligent use of the exquisite artistic potentialities offered by a cast of sixteen Negro girls. There was a sustained tension throughout the rhythmical rise and fall of movement and immobility, and there was a simple seriousness in the collective spirit of the group which carried the work emotionally beyond the limited technical capacities of the dancers. It is regrettable that this fine work disappeared from the repertory with the disbanding of the Negro unit, but two of her pieces—Three Virgins and a Devil (1941) and Tally-Ho (1944)—remain in the repertory.

Agnes de Mille is the granddaughter of Henry George, the Ballet Theatre, and it is wonderful since she has revised and tightened it. The story deals with a Genius who is too preoccupied with his books to pay due attention to his lightsome wife until she starts flirting with the Prince and arouses her husband's anger and jealousy. Eventually, of course, they are reconciled with the help of the eager Innocent. This little drama is set in a stylish Louis XVI park, brimming with the gallant and not too secret adventures of the gay young people of the French court. There is just a suspicion of a discrepancy between the troubles of a neglected wife and the spectacle of outright frivolous love affairs on a generous scale. This might not be noticeable were it not for the fact that there is also a difference in feeling, style and movement pattern. There are moments of genuine emotion and tenderness between husband and wife which do not agree with the merciless sarcasm of the other scenes. But the young wife, because of her intimate charm, is one of the most exquisitely feminine characters to grace the ballet stage, and in Miss de Mille's own engaging performance it assumed a human freshness and fullness which made all the Sylphides look anaemic. As a whole piece the ballet is a virtuoso translation of eighteenth-century social dance and social customs into modern ballet, with sufficient authenticity to establish the period style, and with enough ironical commentary to avoid any trace of pedantry. The dance invention is delightfully witty, the choreographic structure impeccably precise and the whole work has rhythm, pace and drive from beginning to end. Paul Nordoff's musical arrangement has similar qualities of style and wit and subtle comment. The Watteau-ish setting totally misses the point, but the costumes hit it to perfection.

In time and geography these two ballets are far removed from the American scene and yet they are as unmistakably indigenous as Rodeo. The broad medieval farce and the French court comedy both assume a local and familiar air. For it is as impossible for Miss de Mille to escape the powerful influences and idiosyncrasies of her New World background as for the dancers to disguise in Old World manners their essential character and their constitutional movement tendencies. It is indeed fascinating to observe how our ballet artists, unconsciously and intuitively, transform foreign matter into American matter. Our dancers, and probably our audiences too, are readier to identify ballet style with their own kinesthetic experiences than with an alien concept recommended by tradition. The flagrant similarity between the courtesans in Tally-Ho and the sexy picture-postcard girls in Oklahoma! offers an amusing example; they are loose girls of the same mettle, no matter how many centuries and how much ocean separates them. But what they illustrate above all is Miss de Mille's superior sense of humor. The creation of A Lady No Better Than She Should Be in an extraordinary performance by Muriel Bentley, and Two Others Somewhat Worse, in Tally-Ho, reveal the profound understanding of the human character and the philosophical tolerance which distinguish the great humorist and which relate her to Antony Tudor, rather than to Ruth Page, Jerome Robbins and Michael Kidd. While Miss de Mille has the sanguine temperament of the true comedienne, if she chooses to cut loose in the best style of the entertainer, she is also aware of the latent human conflicts in the realm of the absurd and incongruous. Her best funny characters are not the cumulative result of witty details and observations; they are created directly in human humorous matter.

During its first season, the Ballet Theatre also presented three Antony Tudor works which had been performed in England, but were new to the American audience: Dark Elegies, Jardin aux Lilas and Judgment of Paris. The last of these was originally composed as a curtain-raiser; hence its brevity and condensation. In actual performance, however, it has a curiously indefinite duration. Like every genuine drama, it develops in psychological time, measured by emotional units, instead of minutes. And like every genuine comedy, it is potentially a human tragedy with a deliberate twist toward the ridiculous. But this particular comedy is almost unbearably sordid and close to the point where even the most glaring exaggeration seems rationally plausible. The delicate balance in this microcosm depends on a perfection of performance rarely granted to such a small work in an evening of glamorous ballet. Kurt Weill's cynical music is as essential as Tudor's direction. It is a hilarious work with uneasy undertones.

Dark Elegies has a somber lyrical quality quite apart from the spirit of the subject by which it is inspired. Gustav Mahler's Kindertotenlieder are songs of grief and mournful resignation with a definite, literarily conveyed meaning. Tudor's choreography derives its emotional quality from Mahler's profound music rather than from Rückert's intimately personal, elegiac poems on the death of his children. Thus the singer's concrete, realistic words tend to interfere with the pure enjoyment of an abstract dance composition. The work is set in a low key which reduces the range of movements to poignant essentials and demonstrates Tudor's power of imagination. The vocabulary employed throughout is of deceptive economy, achieving an infinity of variations mainly by slight shifts of emphasis and subtle changes in phrasing. Tudor departs almost completely from the conventional ballet idiom, using instead admirably sustained, free movement of no specific design but eminently fitting the purpose. As the choreographer folds it weaves a simple and lucid pattern of compelling beauty. The cycle comprises five Lieder, each having a distinct, individual character, yet as a sequence forming a completely integrated, unified whole. Unfortunately the rhetorically elaborate settings, after Nadia Benois, distract from the quiet dignity of the well-costumed figures.

Jardin aux Lilas or Lilac Garden (Book: Antony Tudor; Music: Ernest Chausson. Setting and Costumes: Robert Sovey, after Hugh Stevenson) is a distinctly modern ballet, not so much because of the times and circumstances in which the action happens to occur, as because it is the beginning of a new phase in the artistic exploration of the human condition in terms of ballet, a beginning which Tudor followed with Lustre, Pillar of Fire and Undertow. Tudor treats the ballet as a logical constellation, out of which the actual drama evolves from a rational premise—a conception which explains his interest in Marcel Proust. The compact emotional intensity which characterizes this specific group of works never degenerates into a display of sentiments for the sake of effect. There is always a psychological motivation and this motivation is clearly and resolutely expressed in the language of movement. Every action, every movement or gesture, visually translated with flawless precision, has a stirring and disquieting significance. The story of Jardin aux Lilas, simple enough in its pattern, involves four main characters in a tense mood which culminates in a coincident, fatal climax. It is as arbitrarily contrived as anything that has ever been on the stage. But out of such stuff the great choreographer creates a work of haunting beauty. The continuous movement is never interrupted by the episodes which advance the story, which suddenly come to the surface, float for an instant and are submerged again. The relationships between characters and incidents are alternately established and disturbed, then clarified and resolved, with an unfailing artistic logic. This engrossing drama of troubling memories and missed opportunities resembles nothing ever done before on the stage. In order to realize it, Tudor created a new ballet idiom which has been analyzed admirably by Edwin Denby. Denby points out, the choreographer used a deliberately archaic, classical terminology as a means of characterizing color and constraint; he uses a more colloquial language for the inhibited, transparent characters; he uses pantomime for the descriptive clarification of a character or a situation; he would seem to indicate that not only Tudor but every progressive artist in the ballet is in a state of active rebellion. While this is true for some—Agnes de Mille and Eugene Loring, for instance—it does not apply to all, for the simple reason that “meaning” and “function” have different implications for different people and different circumstances. A great deal of interesting experimentation in our ballet, for example, Ruth Page’s The Bells and Valerie Bettis’ Virginia Sampler, is tentative, rather than conclusive.

On the whole our ballet reformers, in search for function with a contemporaneous meaning, have been courageous, but not radical. Many promising talents of the younger generation, such as William Dollar, Lew Christensen, Todd Bolander and John Taras, continue to work deliberately in the classical medium. For progress in every creative endeavor has two meanings which are not necessarily mutually exclusive: the exploitation of known possessions and the exploration of unknown territories.

Hence it may be argued, at variance with Mr. Martin’s opinion, that Balanchine’s classical ballets demonstrate a signal return toward vital function. To paraphrase and extend John Martin’s sentence, Balanchine is the next logical step beyond Petipa in the continuation of a classical tradition which is still meaningful, as manifest in the pure perfection of Concerto Barocco, Serenade, Dances Concertantes and Divertimento. He is, as Edwin Denby puts it, “Petipa’s heir.” Many authorities agree with Kirstein that Balanchine, by continuing “the line of tradition of the absolute ballet, restated for our time the absolute aesthetic validity of a new classicism.”

These definitions should clarify the primary question at issue here: the creative interpretation of the classical tradition. This is not to suggest, however, a comparative evaluation of Balanchine’s and Tudor’s artistic stature. The assumption is that both artists consummately achieve in their work the end for which they are striving. Balanchine’s individual version of classicism is acceptable to a modern audience because it grew entirely away from the Imperial Academy whence it stems and now assumes contemporary relevance. But if this is one way to understand tradition as a living force, it is not the only way. It is equally important to bear in mind that Tudor is convinced and determined to continue “naturally and logically” in the great ballet tradition. In fact, the technical foundation of all his compositions is clearly recognizable as that of the classical academic ballet, although often substantially modified or characteristically distorted. In his case the transformation of the expressive idiom is largely determined by his intense preoccupapation with psychological themes. This is new in the ballet—a surprisingly retarded acknowledgment of new methods of interpreting emotional processes which had decisively influenced literature and painting for the past two or three decades. Not before Tudor had ballet choreographers dealt with essentially psychological states, experiences and conflicts. Familiar in the field of modern dance, this discovery amounts in the ballet to a challenge of all conservative concepts of the use and the function of the danse d'école. Indeed no major change in the contemporary ballet is likely to have such profound and far-reaching consequences, although there is no evidence of a rapid or exclusive development in this particular direction. Those who fear for the traditional classical ballet have no reason to be alarmed. Jardin aux Lilas is more than ten years old.

Probably the psychological themes which inspired Jardin aux Lilas, Dim Lustre, Pillar of Fire and Undertow appear obscurely significant to a modern audience which is vaguely familiar with Freudian concepts and the notion of unconscious processes. But to call those ballets psychological dramas is only half right, because, applied to Tudor, the term defines the premise rather than the treatment. This distinguishes Tudor's creations from similar, emotionally complex compositions in the modern dance. That this is not merely a matter of different techniques is clearly illustrated in a comparison between the tragedy of frustration as conceived by Martha Graham in Deaths and Entrances and by Tudor in Pillar of Fire. Both works deal with similar dramatic conflicts caused by a specific psychological situation. In a simplified definition one may say that Martha Graham attempts a direct and spontaneous communication of inner states of mind, while Tudor is concerned with the significance of their exterior manifestations. One is an ineluctably subjective presentation, the other a deliberately objective one. They are essentially different modes of expression, notwithstanding many apparent analogies in subject, structure and form. This distinction explains why there is no reason for Tudor to break radically with the formal, traditional language of the classic regime. He uses it as one of several means of dance expression because, and whenever, it serves a specific purpose of characterization.

Dim Lustre (Book: Antony Tudor. Music: Richard Strauss. Setting and Costumes: Motley) barely has a plot. The Lady With Him and The Gentleman With Her are dancing together in a ballroom, (occasionally interrupted by some slight incident—a touch, a dropped handkerchief, a kiss—which happens alternately to him or to her evoking, much like flash backs in a film, the memory of past and forgotten partners

This sophisticated Edwardian story is presented with a lightness and a playful charm which at first conceals the author's secret cynical amusement. But gradually, from episode to episode, Tudor exposes with merciless detachment the true significance of this frivolous dance dialogue. Eventually the brittle, well-mannered drama is smoothly resolved in the pathetic disillusionment and irreparable alienation of an irresponsible couple. The lovers' problem, which makes the drama, resides in their preoccupation with themselves, even to the point of self-destruction. This may be interpreted as a very subtle and decidedly contemporary version of the theme of frustration. It illuminates the reverse side of love which is not necessarily hatred, but more poignantly still, the incapacity for fulfillment. Technically the ballet is designed with unusual skill. The choreographer makes very effective use of a suggestive dim-out, indicating the moments of transition between present and past, and back again to the present. He also introduces the old music-hall trick of seemingly mirrored pictures which are actually danced by corresponding partners. This device, in representing two equivalent, though not identical, states of reality at the same time, serves to reveal visual images of memories as they might appear in the experience of the protagonists. For brief moments the key figures are made quasi-transparent, each episode supplying another clue to the understanding of the psychological conflict around which the action evolves. Every move and movement is clearly motivated, and apparently irrelevant incidents become suddenly significant and rationally intelligible. The ballroom dancing forms a continuous, moving background for the more intimate scenes which are isolated and accentuated in several exquisite and precise pas de deux.

Pillar of Fire (Book: Antony Tudor. Music: Arnold Schönberg. Settings and Costumes: Jo Mielziner), to quote John Martin, "is a tremendous work which nobody in the ballet field, not even Tudor himself, has yet succeeded in topping." Like Jardin aux Lilas, the ballet is based on a story. Its central figure is Hagar, who loves the Friend and temporarily loses him to the scheming and coquettish Youngest Sister. Hagar feels incapable of competing with the obvious charms of the younger girl and she fears the dismal fate of the Eldest Sister, a cold and loveless spinster. In passionate desperation Hagar gives herself to the experienced Young Man. She feels guilty and unworthy of the Friend who returns to her and who, with moving and reassuring simplicity, leads her toward fulfillment and happiness. Thus reduced to factual content the story recalls the banal middleclass melodrama of the nice girl who often very successfully so. How profoundly those principles affect the actual style of performing is easy to see if, for example, one compares the poignant and exquisite moments of physical intimacy between Tudor's dramatic actors with the ostensible sensual contacts in Scheherazade. It is still understandable today that the explicit realism of the 1910s, which the famous oriental ballet scandalized the audience in 1910. This literal, descriptive realism is of an entirely different order from the pithy authenticity which distinguishes Tudor's work. In the traditional narrative ballet the dramatis personae are created and moved according to the practical requirements of the action. In Tudor's ballets it is just the reverse: the psychological constellation is the absolute premise for the development and presentation of the theme. The actual behavior is determined, with an almost scientific precision, by the compulsive behavior of characters who are in no way realistic portrayals, but rather bold abstractions of characters with many traits as are necessary to justify their behavior and to clarify their function within the drama. In Pillar of Fire, Friend and the Young Man (significantly anonymous) is more abstract than the nameless Elder and Younger Sister; none of them is given as full and explicit a definition as in Pillar of Fire. Thus Pillar of Fire is unmistakably the drama of Hajj, varying the characterization by degrees of definition and thus sets a natural scale of psychological or emotional intensity which coincides accurately with the dramatic or visual action.

As against the stream-of-consciousness method which presents psychological processes as an intricate pattern of interconnections and associations, Tudor uses compellingly the artist's prerogative of selecting essentials to illuminate the human uniqueness of each character so that it becomes unforgettable. This reflection recalls Paul Valéry's words, in his fine essay Degas, Dance, Drawing, that nothing is "more admirable than the transition from the arbitrary to the necessary which is the artist's sovereign act." In Tudor's work the necessity is psychologically determined. To the modern mind psychological inevitability seems far more forceful and acceptable than an inexorable, but unfathomable, fatality. Tudor's work, with its close connection with psychoanalytical thought, particularly in the tendency to establish compulsive relationships between motivation and execution. His work may thus be seen as a reasoned justification of the visual attitude as image, symbol of inner compulsion. This seems a natural attitude for the period which so deliberately stresses the importance of the subconscious in art expression.

When Tudor introduced these subjects, without pre-it is all the more convincing. It is an unromantic, strictly logical optimism which suggests a connection with the trenchant and implacably rational discipline of a Gide or a Proust. While unfolding the drama, Tudor dominates the tempests of passion so deliberately relescd, leaving nothing to the hazards of emotion, either in concept or in realization. Jardin aux Lilas and Pillar of Fire have the same basic pattern of cause and consequence. The outcomes are predetermined by the characters involved; their motives leave no possible alternative of action. The clarity of plan and intention thus revealed conveys to these ballet dramas a quality of definiteness and precision not ordinarily associated with psychological complexities. For all their novelty and daring Tudor's ballets cannot be called experimental in the sense of being tentative or accidental. They are fully matured, completely finished products.

The story of Pillar of Fire vaguely recalls the poetic theme which inspired Arnold Schönberg's Verklärte Nacht and which in turn, may have inspired Tudor's work. This noble score is subjective to the point of obscurity. At any rate, its lyricism is dark and heavy and at a hearing it would hardly suggest dance movement, let alone ballet steps of the strict regime. But Tudor's is a lyricism which never forgets its cerebral obligations; his intuition is tempered by knowledge; his passion is moderated by discipline. There are, in short, congenially related qualities in both the composer's and the choreographer's creativeness which account for Tudor's choice. In his choreographic composition Schönberg's music becomes dance, not so much because it supplies him with danceable material, as because it supplies a lyrical pattern for a rational system of motion and expression. This may help to elucidate John Martin's observation that Tudor "feels under no compulsion to follow the phrasing, to observe the accents, to duplicate the melodic line of the composer; with a basic awareness of all these he proceeds to build his own movement in counterpoint, sometimes widely at variance with them in outward detail, but never in violation of their individual integrity. The effect he achieves in this way is one of astonishing freedom and command." Indeed his choreographic treatment of music, as essential matter, is as unique in the field of the ballet as is Martha Graham's in the domain of modern dance. Jo Mielziner's fin de siècle costumes and settings for Pillar of Fire are admirable because they are at the same time unobtrusive and precise, imaginative and functional.

Undertow (Book: Antony Tudor, after a suggestion by John van Druten. Music: William Schuman. Settings and Costumes: Raymond Breinin) is a disturbing and disconcerting work.

Following, as it does, so consummate an accomplishment as Pillar of Fire, it is odd that it fails to convince. Although Undertow is the logical continuation of the preceding work, it seems as if Pillar of Fire had yielded virtually everything that the psychological genre had to offer Tudor in the way of theatrical potentialities. In fact and implication the Transgressor's drama of guilt and atonement in Undertow is more violent and shocking, but somehow far less moving and compelling than Hagar's drama of guilt and transfiguration. The reasons for this ultimate failure in a creation of such imposing stature are manifold and not easy to analyze. First of all, the directness and lucidity which distinguished Tudor's previous work are here frequently blunted and obscured by allusions and implications of uncertain significance. Thus the mythological, part-Greek, part-Latin designations of the cast of characters suggest more complex meanings than transpire from the simple and specific functions the characters assume in the actual ballet. It is irritating, because not sufficiently justified, that a young bridal couple who leap happily across the stage are pretentiously named Hymen and Hera. One never quite overcomes the uneasy feeling that one is missing a crucial point or important clue, as in fact one may be.

Although Undertow manifests all the characteristics of spectacular theatre, it is essentially a spiritual rather than a visual one; its imagery and symbolism derived from literary concepts. Regarding Undertow, except for the ending, is an inconsistent case history of a psychopathia. It is a purely visual spectacle, which it is by definition and deficient, lacking in structural unitarity. The same episodic treatment that was employed in Dim Lustre and Jardin aux Lilas leads to confusion. There are many poignantly dramatic moments, the swift and vicious rape of Ate or the blood leading to the climax of Medusa's violence, like the grotesque song of the Baccha, rather than the lame appearance, are less forcefully and persuasively motivated. As individual pieces of composition they are often brilliantly in themselves, but in relationship to the main action is not justified, so that the drama as a whole needs sustained emotional suspense and trenchantness, as in Pillar of Fire.

With more accuracy than taste, Undertow is advertised as a "psychological murder story" and its low sensationalism rendered a doubtful work of such manifest artistic seriousness and integrity. One cannot but regret the need for affirming that the solid success of this ballet is not at all due to the morbid appeal of vice, violence and murder, but largely to the mature and discriminating attitude of the American audience. Indeed, it is Tudor's lasting merit that he put his faith and his fate in an untried audience which had barely assimilated the classical ballet and swore by standards of beauty and perfection which he seemingly defied or violated at every step. Without fear or doubt or compromise he kept increasing his demands on the public until it was prepared to accept the Transgressor's agonizing drama with respect and understanding. This sensible and sensitive response is immensely gratifying, for Tudor's excursion into the "psychological slums," as John Martin aptly said, is a remorseless test.

The Ballet Theatre program notes say that "Undertow unfolds like the confession of a neurotic to a psychiatrist. Its tortured hero, frustrated in his infantile love for his mother, writhes eerily through the ballet, doomed to hate the women who most attract him." Doubtless this synopsis is intended to convey desirable information, while actually and unintentionally it succeeds merely in suggesting an unpleasant and unpromising theatrical experience. Any display of human suffering is sure to provoke an immediate, facile response from the top layer of our feelings. A sentimental film, for instance, rarely fails to arouse tearful sympathy, even against our better taste and judgment. The human drama without the redeeming quality of greatness, in the stature of the characters involved or in the nature of its essential conflicts or in the concept and consequence of the presentation, makes good news copy, not a work of art. Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment, reduced to the bare skeleton of facts, appears merely as a shocking case of premeditated murder. What elevates both crimes, Raskolnikov's and the Transgressor's, above the commonplace misery of clinical record and courtroom report is the revelation of aesthetic and emotional potentialities inherent, but not apparent, in the subject matter. It takes the inspiration of a truly creative artist to convince us of the uniqueness and nobility of his hero's suffering in order to incite profound, emphatic compassion.

The Transgressor is not Oedipus, although the analogy is almost forced upon our consciousness. For all the fierce passion displayed in the action of Undertow, Tudor once again presents his case with a dispassionate, almost scientific detachment. The Transgressor's story constitutes a regular psychoanalytical biography, starting with the birth of the patient, then

Group from Rodeo, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1942
 Photo Fred Fehl

Group from Frankie and Johnny, Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 1945

and NORA KAYE
in Pillar of Fire,
Ballet Theatre, 1942

Phata:
Alfreda Valente.

NANA GOLLNER
and HUGH LAING
in Undertow,
Ballet Theatre, 1945

Group from Tolly Ho Ballet Theatre, 1944

Photo: Fred

Civil War Ballet in Bloomer Girl 1944 Photo Eileen Darby, Graphic H

demonstrating the initial traumatic shock which causes the Oedipus complex from which he suffers, and eventually arriving at a somewhat irresolute conclusion which turns unexpectedly symbolical. This protracted and diffused ending is puzzling. The courageous and provocative treatment of the first two parts of the ballet arouses unusual expectations which remain unfulfilled. After the strangulation scene, which is skillfully prepared and which has all the gripping power and fatal inevitability of great drama, there is a break in the consistency of the artistic treatment. This, in turn, causes a marked break in pace and tension and leads to a feeling of emptiness and disappointment.

In the end, one awakens to the realization that the hero has not become quite as real as the secondary characters which surround him, that he has moved outside the dramatic universe set for him, and that he has vanished from the scene, literally and figuratively, without leaving a noticeable void. This indicates that the elusive deficiency of the work is not of a purely aesthetic order, but is also, if not only, due to a lack of definition in the basic conception. It appears, particularly in the epilogue, that the Transgressor represents a perfectly credible, theoretical concept of a neurotic character, but fails to assume life and volume. In a beautifully stylized performance he renders a stirring demonstration of human behavior under abnormal emotional stress. But this emphatic exhibitionism exposes, the surer for being so explicit, the elusiveness of the Transgressor as a dramatic character. The precision which marked his birth and the decisive stations of his painful progress through life is later invalidated by the vagueness of his end. This is nearly fatal because Undertow is so definitely conceived as the Transgressor's drama; he is not only the center, but the very raison d'être of the work.

The plot of Undertow is established on rational premises and with clarity of purpose. The mother's critical rejection of the son is shown in a scene of beautiful simplicity and the growth of the protagonist's neurosis (to use the appropriate term) could be described as consecutive phases of a psychoanalysis in reverse. But it is this very feature of constantly endangering the integrity of style and the perfection of the whole work. This becomes each time the treatment departs from the rational demonstration and deviates into a infinitely more general validity than the heretofore private, case seems entitled to claim. The ancient mixture of symbolic and descriptive, pantomimic elements—hence the point of Considered in individual moments the pictorial and plastic qualities of the work appear at times in realizations of intense and striking beauty. Visually the Transgressor imposes his presence forcefully enough; which is just as it should be in an optical spectacle. However, he dominates the stage by virtue of the prominent, physical position assigned him in the choreography, not on the strength of an immanent authority. As the drama advances, comprising an ever-increasing number of incidental characters, the driving force seems to give out under the additional strain and pretty nearly fails altogether after the frenzied acceleration in the murder scene. There is less and less movement and in the epilogue it slows down almost to a standstill. The ballet ceases to be dance. It ends as a tableau vivant. This picture impression is further stressed by the static character of Breinin's décor, which may well correspond to the choreographer's concept, but which does not participate actively or dynamically in the movement pattern of the ballet. There is no justification for the arbitrary repetition on the backdrop of the painter's familiar motive of flying horses, impressive though they may be, unless they be regarded as a rather literary and unnecessary illustration of the Transgressor's Fury-haunted imagination. William Schuman's score is on a high level of competence, again in the prevailing spirit of obviously descriptive, rather than implicitly suggestive, accompaniment, but there are occasional discrepancies between the loud drama of the music and the silent torture of the suffering hero.

Gala Performance (Book: Antony Tudor. Music: Serge Prokofieff, orchestrated by Paul Baron. Settings and Costumes: Nicolas de Molas) is the lively picture of a gala performance at the "Theatre Royal," featuring the first joint appearance of three famous ballerinas, a Russian, an Italian and a French one. The first part of the ballet shows the gloomy backstage milieu shortly before the curtain rises; the second part presents the actual gala performance in the full glamor of stage lighting and décor. As performed today, after countless repetitions, recastings and extensive touring, this work is hardly more than a very ingenious burlesque, a "company romp," to quote Ann Barzel. Originally the ballet doubtless held the substance of a genuine and rather terrifying satire on human behavior at large. The competitive situation implies a deadly viciousness and the completely submissive position of the male dancers throughout the performance is not only funny; it also suggests a sharp and significant commentary. The extreme care and thoroughness with which Tudor designed the character of each one of the protagonists makes it likely, if not certain, that he intended more than just plain amusement. However virulence and the accumulated, hateful jealousy materialize in the savage reality of genuine human beings because the ballerinas remain detached, two-dimensional. They are the most horribly authentic abstract ballerinas, highly polished instruments of perfection and magic, and it is a relief that Tudor makes use of them.

THE BALLET THEATRE I

While the introductory scene begins with broad good fun, it also prepares for the ruthless cruel pending contest. In fact, it is in this unobtrusive pantomime that the dramatic tension originates, as the ballet triumphantly through the difficult pantomimed and intricate display of ballet technique, which is inevitably lost to all but professional dancers. It is probably for this reason that the choreographer has attempted at times to exaggerate beyond the subtle satiric characterization and occasionally fall into parody which cheapens the effect. Actually the choreographer has left no room for improvisations of any kind. Tudor, being here, as always, is precise, definite and thorough in the last detail. Therefore the dancers are safest and most successful in this delicate ballet if they rely completely on the clear and pantomimic directions he has devised for them. The artistic perfection of Gala Performance depends on the perfection of its balletic style, because its brittle style is not conceived in terms of finely differentiated human beings. Called La Reine de la Danse (from Moscow), La Danse (from Milan) and La Fille de Terpsichore (Paris), the three ballerinas represent categorical three national characters, three national styles and three particular types of the ballerina. Each one, then, is a character, not entitled to the spontaneous expressive individual, human traits. The same applies to the Cavaliers and the fin de siècle, coyly indifferent characters.

The choice of the Prokofiev score, too, seems to be Tudor's essentially serious intention: it removes the interpretation of the theme from the shallowness of the popular and lifts it to the higher level of the deliberate. The costumes of de Molas are no more than adequate. His costumes are among the most imaginative, subtle and charming in this usually unforgivably dull department.

Romeo and Juliet (Book: Antony Tudor, after William Shakespeare. Music: Frederick Delius. Settings and Costumes: Antony Tudor) is a magnificent spectacle and probably the most beautiful and exquisite theatre piece on the contemporary stage. That is its main merit and no mean one. Although seems to be lost and forgotten, it is a legitimate and traditional function of the theatre to create images of grandeur with all the technical equipment of the theatrical apparatus and with all the magic means of scenic illusion. Today, whatever inadequate efforts are made to revive the theatrical spectacle in the grand style are usually attempted in the movies.

In arranging this delicate subject for the ballet stage, Tudor may have tried "the unnecessary and the impossible," as one English critic observed. At the very least the choreographer must have realized that it was a daring undertaking to recreate in new terms a work of art that has assumed, in our cultural heritage, certain definite and immutable qualities. It would be interesting to compare Tudor's ballet with Robert Helpmann's one-act Hamlet; for the problem of adaptation is essentially the same. Both choreographers chose to work against heavy odds in selecting plays which are so familiar and almost sacrosanct. Yet we have every reason to be grateful to Tudor for the attempt, for he succeeded in creating a beautiful work, though not a great ballet. Contrary to reasonable expectation he was more successful in translating poetic language into expressive movement than in remolding the narrative. In his treatment of the story its lyricism is more powerful than the drama and some of the duo scenes between Romeo and Juliet have the quality of timeless perfection.

In its general dramatic concept Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet is broadly designed in the black and white of elemental passions, stressing the sharp contrast between hatred and love. Tudor's version is more uniformly shaded, rendered in the delicate half-tones and nuances of subdued passions. This ingenious change of emphasis conveys to Tudor's balletic adjustment its particular quality and charm. Although the choreographer respects the essential integrity of the original drama, he has neither attempted a literal illustration nor tried to stimulate a literary drama in mute language. He remains strictly within the formal category of his medium though ranging widely from expressive dance movement to distinct pantomime. If he is not entirely successful, the reason is not to be found in any intrinsic weakness in the choreographic treatment, but in the irrepressible life of Shakespeare's word as it rings in our memory. Comparisons between the spoken and the silent version are unavoidable and detrimental to the latter. Aside from these reservations, Tudor's arrangement is a dramaturgic masterpiece. He has skilfully condensed the story to a minimum, while preserving the feeling of epic breadth and endless time. Not one scene is overcrowded with characters or events; not one moment is nervously rushed by pressing action. The narrative develops slowly and proceeds at a beautifully sustained pace. The dramatic continuity is so surely maintained throughout that one is hardly aware of changes and abbreviations and never misses anything that may seem essential.

The Elizabethan fullness of the drama, however, is definitely lost and its richness is diluted. After the spell of the performance is broken there remains but little recollection of the dead fights and lively actions which have been happening on the stage, and in retrospect the overwhelming scenic splendour seems oddly empty and artificial. Only the intimate scenes between the lovers remain as so many exquisite miniatures. The innocent sophistication of those two noble children, the intense tenderness of feeling, the infinite tact in the erotic contacts, the dreamlike trance of love, create an unforgettable climate of genuine poetry. At the very end the pointless cruelty of the twin deaths is resolved in images of delicate sweetness without the slightest trace of sentimentality. In those rare moments the absence of speech becomes irrelevant and the drama is whole and complete.

The whole production is a well-balanced, unified work of art, a modern version of the theatrical synthesis of poetry, music, painting and plastic expression in which the artists of the Renaissance excelled. This scenic solution was not the original intention; for at first the painter Salvador Dali had been commissioned to design a décor which was eventually abandoned. Those designs, now in the collection of the Marquis de Cuevas suggest fascinating possibilities toward an exploration of the subject in symbolic images of the paranoid subconscious, much in the way the artist interpreted Wagner's Tristan and Isolde. Eugene Berman approached the problem more realistically, in full and conscious possession of a valid tradition. There is an essential and congenial relation between Berman and the theatrical technicians and magicians of the High Renaissance and Baroque. But the spectacle in the grand style, such as the Courts and the Churches lavished on their audiences in the past, demands a more active participation of the public than our modern society affords. The festive spirit of the extraordinary, the unique, the magnificent vanished with the evolution of theatrical mass production. Only the opera and the ballet have preserved a semblance of past glory. In this slightly faded spirit Eugene Berman revived the picture of a highly civilized Renaissance, where life moves with accomplished grace and death occurs in stately pomp. It is all very wonderful in its formal refinement and flawless taste. But it is too finished, too genuine for the good of the theatre; it eliminates, rather than stimulates, the imagination. One finishes by admiring Berman and forgetting the ballet.

In these descriptions of Tudor's ballets one essential factor has been omitted: the dancer. Ordinarily a choreographic character can be analyzed adequately in the impersonal terms of style criteria. There are only a few instances where the personalities of the dancers are inseparably connected with a specific stage character. Such was the case in the romantic era when Marie Taglioni was the one and only Sylphide, Carlotta Grisi the one and only Giselle and the four-star ballerinas of the period were united in the historical Pas de Quatre. Other examples of legendary accomplishment may be found in every period, but they merely indicate that, as a matter of course, outstanding artists are naturally best remembered in the parts to which they owe their fame. In Tudor's ballets the place of the dancer is fundamentally different. Here the individual becomes identified with a specific part not because of a stellar position or some hazard of casting, but on the strength of an essential and unique function in the total work. Strictly speaking, the dancer is irreplaceable in the organic whole of the composition, in the same final sense as Nijinsky's Faun or Til Eulenspiegel cannot be duplicated by any dancer, regardless of his stature.

A character like Giselle, however familiar it may be to every balletophile, contains merely amorphous poetic and dramatic potentialities which may be defined in as many valid interpretations as there are dancers to present it. But the character of Hagar in Pillar of Fire is unique because it has been realized through the emotional medium of the one rare artist who proved to be capable of the total identification which Tudor demands in every single instance. Nora Kaye becomes Hagar not because she is a dramatic dancer without peer or a woman of keen intelligence; there is a more profoundly human qualification than talent, technique and brains, that is genuineness of emotion. It is Tudor's extraordinary gift to convey psychological authenticity to every character he creates, whether it be psychotic like the Transgressor, poetic like Juliet or satiric like the Russian ballerina. Tudor's means are his secret and it is doubtful if even his close collaborators ever become conscious of the mysterious method he employs to stimulate their latent capacities to heights of unsuspected accomplishment. It is entirely due to Tudor's flair that he entrusted Alicia Markova with the unfamiliar pantomime assignment of Juliet, thus presenting her with an opportunity to create one of her most moving characterizations. It was daring, but highly successful, to cast two classical ballerinas, Alicia Alonso and Nana Goll-analyze it in technical terms, and in any case the essential evidence would not be contained in the traditional ballet vocabulary. Tudor's style, even when it adheres closely to the danse d'école, is based on the performing individual; it is the dancer's personality made manifest. For the first time in ballet history the dancer is called upon to interpret a character as a means toward the creative realization of his own self. It took the genius of Nijinsky to make the exception. It took the genius of Tudor to make the rule.

This is an act of emancipation as momentous and significant as Fokine's reforms some forty years ago. Fokine decreed, as one of the essential rules, that dancing and mimetic gesture serve as an expression of the dramatic action. Tudor goes one decisive step further in that he examines the very nature of this expression and demands that it be psychologically motivated. Just as the other great choreographer searched archives and records for ethnological and historical information, so Tudor intuitively probes the sources of human emotions for symptoms and symbols of compulsive behavior. He presents only surface evidence of his psychological findings and statements, though with the merciless detachment and accuracy of a scientific report. Between the realism of Scheherazade and the "magic realm" of Pillar of Fire occurred the whole evolution of this century's aesthetic concepts.

The Ballet Theatre II

JEROME ROBBINS AND MICHAEL KIDD

THE PROGRESS of the Ballet Theatre was never steady and regular and it would be useless to render a season-by-season account of its erratic course. Comparatively speaking, however, Tudor was a stable force in maintaining the artistic integrity of the Ballet Theatre and whatever coherence and personality it succeeded in preserving must be credited largely to him. It is either a strange irony or a revealing fact that the fate of the representative American company should depend to such an extent on an Englishman whose creative work has a markedly cosmopolitan character.

The quality, then, which conveys to the Ballet Theatre its unmistakably American flavor is subtle and elusive, a spiritual climate rather than a tangible landmark, a human element rather than an objective style criterion. The process of assimilation from Russian to American has been amazingly fast, too fast, in fact, to be fully reflected yet in the current repertory. It is anybody's guess what direction the American ballet will take from here. The abundance of dancers and the scarcity of choreographers have created a temporary crisis of artistic insecurity; neither the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo nor the Ballet Theatre is in a position to take the leadership and to serve as an absolute standard.

Only ten years ago Lincoln Kirstein tried to formulate the essentials of an American style; in Blast at Ballet he said, "American style springs or should spring from our own training and environment, which was not in an Imperial School or a Parisian imitation of it. Ours is a style bred also from basketball courts, track and swimming meets and junior proms. Our style springs from the personal atmosphere of recognizable American types. . . ."

This statement is still applicable and, in the light of our present knowledge, assumes particular significance. As we know now it was not to be Kirstein or any other single individual who would furnish the conclusive evidence for the soundness of his reasoning and his belief in a native ballet. T he American dance potential was too slow for his impatient temperament. When his ideas finally materialized on a large scale his own company had already gone out of existence and he himself had abandoned the very reforms which he had advocated in his writings and realized in the Ballet Caravan. But in the intervening years almost all his early artistic associates had gradually moved into the front line of progress. Today, in Edwin Denby's words, "choreographers, dancers and dance public have established a new kind of ballet in this country which is inherently American and internationally valid."

Two essential tendencies in the formative process of the American ballet may be suggested as likely to determine its future course. One trend is the affirmation of a new classicism as manifested in the work of George Balanchine and his disciples. The other, as exemplified by Tudor, points in the direction of the dramatic narrative; as it is used by Agnes de Mille and Jerome Robbins, there is a trend toward amplifying the expressive means by including other theatrical media—speech, song, music and pantomime—and integrating them with the dance proper.

Denby observes that "Ballet Theatre crystallized its version of our style with Pillar of Fire and the Monte Carlo with Danses Concertantes." It is noteworthy that this eminent critic considers these two ballets, choreographed respectively by an Englishman and a Russian, as crystallizations of our style and inherently American. The assumption is clearly that there is a common essence in works of substantially divergent character and that precisely is the quality of style. Supported by the authority of Denby's contention, we may attempt a more explicit definition. In point of time the new style made its appearance on the ballet stage with the first generation of native, American-trained artists who had thoroughly absorbed the alien vocabulary of the danse d'école. But, as John Martin once remarked, the Americans are anti-classic; they destroy or attempt to destroy the classic form. If one stresses the concept of form one may even go further and venture to say that the Americans, in every creative endeavor, tend to defy the imposition of formal discipline. It is highly significant that Lincoln Kirstein maintains, in Blast at Ballet: "A salient feature of American style is the presence or at least the appearance of the presence of spontaneous improvisation. When a Russian accomplishes a difficult classic variation with his own suave mastery of technique, one assumes he has done it hundreds of times before. When an American dances well one almost feels he is making it up as he goes along. Vaudeville training capitalized on the feature and made it one of the most attractive in the American theatrical idiom."

There exists a vital American stage tradition outside the ballet theatre, antedating by many generations the systematic training of our dancers in the classical ballet. The most powerful incentive in their immediate search for an adapted, or, better still, an indigenous, dance expression was the sheer inward need for self-realization, which is essentially a creative impulse. And there were innumerable young people to whom the brilliant, extrovert elegance of the Russian ballet appealed more than the complex introspection of a Martha Graham. Our dancers learned fast and well. But no sooner had their magnificent physical potential been shaped into the precision instrument of the traditional technique than it threatened to escape the guiding hand of the masters. The discovery of their creative capacities incited any number of talented but inexperienced ballet dancers and choreographers to assert their individuality and independence.

There followed a transitional period of competition between the solidly established, foreign-style repertory and the tentative American one in which, of course, the older was superior in scope, prestige and glamour. It would be too facile, however, to interpret the unequal rivalry solely as an antagonism between conservative and progressive tendencies, no matter how tempting such a theory may be. For the range of subject interest in the home-grown repertory was rather obstinately limited to indigenous source material of an obvious nature. Although this was new and exciting in content and imagery tended to be retrospective, rather than progressive in spirit. One of our early dance pioneers, Ted Shawn, stated more than twenty years ago that "we are full to abundance with undeveloped ideas and themes." But in proudly taking the inventory of this thematic material our ballet creators were often carried away by their enthusiasm and they were inclined to confuse grass-root genuineness with artistic validity. They produced many fine works, rich in core and substance but vague in focus and undeveloped in expression. Remembering the number of the earlier ballets with authentic American subject matter Page's, Christensen's, Littlefield's and Kirstein's companies and some of Massine's excursions into the same field, we begin to appreciate that our ballet has only recently outgrown the self-conscious, deliberate phase of literal Americana. The only surviving works of this period are Ruth Page's Frankie and Johnny and Eugene Loring's Billy the Kid.

All this brings us to the realization that whatever the so-called American style is far more inclusive than the variety of American subject matter. In fact, the theme proper is irrelevant, or at least secondary; its spirit and its treatment are the decisive factors. For style develops with the emergence of a new spirit and with the appearance of a new form. Style is the visual symbol of a mode of thought, rather than of standards of conduct. The style of a ballet, therefore, may coincide with the subject matter, but it is not identical with it. Massine's Saratoga is a case in point. In spite of its local theme and color it merely offered clichés of Americanisms in continental style. On the other hand Agnes de Mille's Tally-Ho, set in a Louis XVI garden, is every bit as American as her Rodeo, Jerom Robbins's plotless Interplay is even more "inherently American" than his slangy Fancy Free, and Danses Concertantes, created collectively by a Russian-born composer, choreographer, designer and leading ballerina, could never have materialized in a similar fashion outside the United States.

Edwin Denby writes: "Till the contrast of foreign ensemble gives us a sharper view of our style, we sense its nature best in the cleanness of our young ballerinas—Alonso, Boris, Hightower, Kaye, Moylan, Tallchief, to list them alphabetically—but it shows too in thirty or forty soloists." It is not aristocratic in the Imperial tradition, but it is well mannered ("civilized," as Denby says) and full of native dignity; it is not sophisticated in the Diaghilev-Kochno-Cocteau sense, but it is full of sharp comment, observation and intelligence; it is not detached and deliberate in the continental manner, but full of uninhibited rhythm and infectious joy; it is not meticulously accurate in the traditional virtuoso fashion, but it is full of bodily self-confidence and youthful stamina. And there is this other quality which Walt Whitman detects in the American common people: "their manly tenderness and native elegance of soul." Our ballet style, while preserving and respecting the basic discipline is beginning to assume the tone of our time, the character of our place and the features of our people.

For the American ballet artists, the problem of style is surely not a matter of serious and deliberate preoccupation. Candidly unconcerned with aesthetic issues and definitive formulations they have simply taken advantage of a new expressive medium and made it their own; it is no wonder that our style appears somewhat casual and tentative. But the American arts generally have not nearly reached the point of consolidation or stabilization. They are still in a phase of exploration, still moved by an impatient pioneer urge for speed, progress and change. This realistic and affirmative attitude is definitely in our style; it makes it clean, fast and powerful. In every way our style is a reflection of our immediate present as it is manifested in the lives and experiences of the people and in their social behavior and physical bearing.

Jerome Robbins's Fancy Free, produced by the Ballet Theatre in 1944, is the first substantial ballet entirely created in the contemporary American idiom, a striking and beautifully convincing example of genuine American style. Robbins's artistic statements are spontaneous, eloquent, frank and informal. His work, already considerable, is neither pretentious nor aggressive and if it does not exactly engage mature thought on matters of consequence, neither does the classical repertory. Like all of Robbins's creations, Fancy Free is eminently theatrical and surely in that respect it lives within the oldest and most venerable traditions. Robbins's intuitive understanding of the theatre is quite remarkable. His contact with the audience is as sure and immediate as if he were a seasoned trouper, and he communicates with the spectators as freely and naturally as with a circle of friends. Lincoln Kirstein's observation that our actors and dancers "wish to establish a direct connection, approaching personal intimacy or its theatrical equivalent with their audience," seems especially fitting. "The Russians keep their audience at arm's length. We almost invite ours to dance with us. Anyone of us would like to know Fred Astaire, since we have known other nice, clever, happy but unassuming boys like him." Kirstein could have used the very same words to describe the effect of Robbins's choreography and dancing.

Jerome Robbins is unmistakably American, born, raised, schooled and trained here, the hero of one of those wonderful success stories which nourish the hopes and aspirations of every struggling youngster in the theatre world. From anonymity to stardom, his life story fits the pattern in which they all fervently believe. He confirms and symbolizes the reality beyond their dreams of glory. He is just one of them. Jerry, at once typical and exceptional. He was the boy next door, the classmate in school, the pal in the dance class, the neighbor in the chorus line, and his ascent to fame was inexorably driven by the cumulative energies of American boys and girls. This participation, this feeling of identification extends to the characters which populate his ballets; they are real people, intimately familiar and full of autobiographical reminiscence.

Jerome Robbins was born in New York in 1918. He refused to enter upon a business career and joined instead the Sandoz-Felicia Sorel "Dance Center" in 1937. His training was thorough and diversified. He studied ballet with Anna Sokolova, Hitchins, Loring, Nemtchinova. Platoff. Modern with the New Dance League, Spanish with Veloz, Oriental with Fanny and Interpretative with Bentley and Sonya Robbins. For some years he danced in various Broadway shows, but "he couldn't get out of that second chorus line," as he stated in a recent interview. In 1940 he joined the newly-formed Ballet Theatre and appeared in practically every ballet on its repertory, sometimes only in the corps de ballet, but also in an imposing number of solo parts. In 1944 he leapt into fame with Fancy Free, which he expanded in the same year into the Broadway musical On the Town. For Billy Rose's "Concert Varieties" he choreographed Interplay (1945) later included in the Ballet Theatre repertory, also in 1945 he choreographed the musical Billion Dollar Baby. The ballet Facsimile followed in 1946. For the Original Ballet Russe he created a Pas de Trois (1947), later taken over by the Markova-Dolin company, and for a special performance the ballet suite Summer Day (1947), now performed by the Ballet Theatre. With the musicals High Button Shoes (1947) and Look, Ma, I'm Dancing (1948) he became one of the most prominent choreographers on Broadway.

Taken as evidence of an uninterrupted sequence of happy stations toward success, this account is certainly remarkable, although not exceptional. There is nothing particularly personal or American about his accomplishments, in fact, nothing at all that might not just as well apply to the early, prodigious feats of the younger generation of Russian choreographers in Central Europe, Leonide Massine, George Balanchine and Serge Lifar. (Massine, incidentally, composed a sailor ballet, Les Matelots, in 1925.) On this side of the Atlantic, Agnes de Mille's fast rise to prominence and stature shows many similarities with Robbins's professional career. Actually, de Mille's Rodeo antedates Fancy Free by two years, and at that time everyday American themes were already known and accepted on the ballet stage. All these parallels and precedents seem to place Jerome Robbins within the framework of established tradition and, in spite of all the blasting impetus and newness of his work, he is not a determined fighter or a purposeful revolutionary. The apparent casualness with which he presents his subjects and his characters suggests tentative improvisation, rather than methodical deliberation. Indeed the uniqueness of his creative contribution is hard to define because of the very absence of spectacular or radical features.

The predominant quality of Robbins's personality and work is native simplicity, that rare and wonderful simplicity which many artists strive a lifetime to achieve as the supreme test of maturity. In essence it implies a moral attitude, in effect it becomes an artistic principle. For this the fragile, little piece, Summer Day, furnishes a perfect illustration. This volatile pas de deux, set to Prokofieff's piano suite Music for Children, is extremely modest in content and execution: two children playfully amusing themselves with a parody on various ballet traditions and mannerisms. In Tudor's hands a similar subject turned into the large-scale comedy-drama of Gala Performance which employs several soloists, a whole corps de ballet and a full load of explosive potentialities of human emotions. In Summer Day, Robbins works with a minimum of means within the narrowest possible scope of theatrical effects. The simplicity of invention and interpretation is manifest. Everything that occurs seems to be improvised, inspired by the alternating moods and imaginations of two children, playing with unconscious grace. They are actually and unmistakably accomplished artists, although they seem to be unaware of their aptitude. Like other, more ambitious, creations of the choreographer, this miniature ballet shows that characteristic mixture of utmost discipline and complete relaxation, one giving the assurance of professional competence, the other conveying the delightful sensation of effortless enjoyment. There is an old saying in the theatre that the most convincing improvisations are those which have been carefully prepared and rehearsed.

It is significant that Robbins is an excellent and versatile dancer. The ease and naturalness of his performance, the complete technical assurance of his execution, the essential musicality of his interpretation, all these qualities which distinguish his dancing are reflected in his choreography. Robbins's characters too dance, not because he devises meaningful or beautiful steps for them, but because they are so conceived that they cannot do otherwise, because there is a physical and emotional exuberance in them which, of necessity, becomes dance, as with children and primitives. Thus he preserves the nature of spontaneousness and immediacy, even in the most intricate and exacting choreography. Actually, of course, his ballets are almost as hard to execute as Balanchine's complex devices or Tudor's intense projections or any proverbially difficult part in the classic repertoire.

Robbins's choreography has an intimately personal character; it develops and moves along like a spirited conversation between the performers, informally inviting and including the audience behind the footlights. Thus Summer Day is a lovely, light conversation piece, with occasional glimpses of malice and sharp comment, but generally pleasant, friendly and ephemeral. Fancy Free is colloquial, noisy, swaggering, sometimes tender and self-conscious, like the rough and straightforward language of plain people. Interplay is a more ordered conversation, halfway between studio sessions and jam sessions.

informal, yet well mannered; it is a conversational interplay delivered for its own sake, for the sole pleasure of clever articulation and witty repartee, not seriously concerned with matters of consequence or substantial results. Facsimile indulges in aimless and futile talk, using a painfully twisted, artificial language, decorated with irrelevancies and inconsequential innuendos.

It seems quite natural that Robbins has considered including actual speech in the ballet. In an unproduced scenario, Bye Bye Jackie, written in 1944, he states in an introductory paragraph:

Bye Bye Jackie is a new form toward fusing the potentialities of ballet and theatre. It employs three mediums of expression: dance, music and voice. . . . Bye Bye Jackie cannot be done as a ballet alone, nor as a play alone, nor as just expressive music. The form should emerge as a real braiding of these three mediums, all completely stemming from the emotional line of the characters and situation. There is no talk for talk's sake, dance for dance's sake, or music because it is nice music. Dialogue, choreography, score, should perform strict functional purposes, whether jointly or separately. This would have to be worked out very carefully between the composer and the choreographer so that a true weaving and honest justification for any moment is arrived at. They should also agree on what means is being used when, to tell the story. . . . When actual work is started, however, the composer and choreographer should not be limited or coerced by the scenario or dialogue, but rather use the structural patterns, cutting and expanding as they feel necessary.

This note was not meant for publication, and it is printed here with the express intention of preserving a fresh, first-hand statement of importance. In all fairness it must be appreciated that Robbins has not attempted to formulate a theory for general discussion; the thought probably never entered his mind. He is neither concerned here with aesthetic or dogmatic concepts of the dance, nor with the valuation or revaluation of ballet as an art form. In giving practical working instructions for the production, he simply states ideas of his own for purposes of his own. But in doing so he unconsciously provokes and challenges the defenders of the traditional classic ballet. The subject cannot be dismissed without some cursory comment because the controversy is in a very active phase. Robbins, of course, does not stand alone. The tendency to use more inclusive theatrical resources than the ballet of the strict regime of the 1930s is no longer a matter of experiment or argument. Agnes de Mille and Antony Tudor have gone unconventional ways and conclusively proved the artistic validity of their work. The antagonism between the two major tendencies, the classical and the dramatic, is artificial and unnecessary. As long as Scheherazade is not only suffered, but requested by the audience, there is no earthly justification to question the balletic legitimacy of, for instance, Fancy Free. And the fact is possibly that the argument pro et contra is not so much rational as purely emotional, with Fokine serving as the star witness for the conservative group. One may well suspect, however, that the creator of Les Sylphides, were he still alive, would be the first spectator to applaud the creator of Fancy Free. It is fortunate that, owing to the kindness of its author, the libretto for Fancy Free can be reproduced here in full.

Fancy Free (Book: Jerome Robbins. Music: Leonard Bernstein. Setting: Oliver Smith. Costumes: Kermit Love.) The original title page reads as follows:

FANCY FREE

A one-act ballet based on an incident concerning three sailors on a shore leave

Characters:

Three Sailors .....	Jerome Robbins, Harold Lang, John Kriz:
The Brunette .....	Muriel Bentley
The Red-Head .....	Janet Reed
The Blonde .....	Shirley Eckl
(Bartender .....	Rex Cooper)

Time: The present; a hot summer night.

Place: New York.

This is the story of three sailors who are out on the town on a Shore Leave. It is a jazz ballet, light in mood, running about 15 minutes. The costumes for the sailors should be the regular dark sailors' uniforms. The girls should wear actual street dresses which permit free movement. The bartender should wear the usual white apron-jacket combination. The set, imaginatively designed, should represent a city street, a bar at center stage so that its interior is visible, and a lamppost stage left. The action takes place at night.

(Perhaps a subway entrance stage right—No.)

Music and Mood

Fast, explosive, jolly, rollicking. A bang-away start.

Action

Three sailors explode onto the stage. They are out on shore leave, looking for excitement women, drink, any kind of fun they can stir up. Right now they are fresh, full of animal exuberance and boisterous spirits, searching for something to do, something to happen. Meanwhile they dance down the street with typical sailor movements—the brassy waltz the ii all steamed up and ready to go. They boldly strut, swagger and kid each other along. This section should serve as an introductory dance as well; bright, fast, gay, happy. One should feel immediately that the three are good friends, used to bumming around together, used to each other's guff . . . that they are in the habit of spending their time as a trio, and that, under all their rough and tumble exterior, there is a real affection for each other, a kind of "my buddy" feeling.

They finally arrive at the lamppost around which they gradually settle as the first impetus and excitement of being on shore dies down. One, with his arm crooked around the pole, swings slowly back and forth; another rocks on his heels; the third leans: and the more seriously they become involved with what to do next, the quieter they become. Finally they decide that a drink is what they need. They saunter toward the bar, enter, and each approaches the bar and places his foot on the rail. They order up three beers which the bartender serves. They pick up their glasses and clink them together in a mutual toast. Simultaneously they lift, drain, and plunk their glasses back on the bar. A moment of satisfaction; a pause of relaxation. They turn front and, as part of their habits, choose to see who pays. Two of them secretly agree on the same amount of fingers, and consequently the odd man pays. He shakes his head (as if this happens all the time, which it does), and pays. The three hitch their pants and move to the door, where they stand looking out at the night and street. One yawns, another stretches, and the third produces a slice of gum, breaks it in three parts and hands a piece to each. Each unwraps it, rolls up the paper, puts the gum in his mouth, and then with a neat kick, deftly flips the wrapper away. They stand in the doorway chewing. A pause of satisfaction, a sigh of "Now what should we do?"

The tempo changes and the Brunette enters from the left. (She's a nice girl who doesn't mind the horsplay about to happen. In fact, she knows it's coming the minute she sees them and anticipates the fun of it.) Her quality and movements should be in the style of the music. There should be an influence of the Negro fluidity and suppleness, the under-excitement and sexuality in her walk and dancing. She has to cross the stage in front Transition period to slower mood.

Slow, relaxed . . . music should have literal meanings as far as specific action is concerned.

Dreamy . . . waiting . . .

Sudden, loud, change of tempo and mood. Hot boogie-woogie influence, which quiets down to being insistent with sudden hot loud licks.

of the sailors. They are motionless except for their heads which follow her closely, their eyes sizing her up, their mouths still chewing. As she passes them, all three impudently tip their hats. She goes on smiling but ignoring them. Then they really get into action, an "Aha, a female—here we go" routine. They spruce themselves up. They pick up her walk and rhythms and try to insinuate themselves with her. They tease and heckle her, trying to get her to break down. They attempt various approaches and techniques, the "Hi, sister," etc. They snatch her bag and toss it from one to the other. She pretends to be angry with them, and annoyed, but both she and they know she isn't. She actually enjoys the attention very much, and with subtlety leads them a merry chase. Of course, three sailors are too many for one girl and the competition seems too much for one of them: he tires of the horseplay and shuffling; his enthusiasm ebbs; and he allows the other two to go off trailing her. As they go off, the sailors are still persistent, and she still has her reserve about her, but it looks as if it's breaking down.

The remaining sailor watches after them a while. At the same time the Redhead enters from the opposite side. He turns to go back into the bar and they come face to face, almost bumping. He gives her the once-over quickly, and then excuses himself for bumping into her as a means of introducing himself and picking her up. She realizes it but likes it and him. He looks back to be sure the others have gone off, then turns and suggests a drink—to which she agrees, and they enter the bar. They order up a drink, finally leading into a dance. This pas de deux should be different in timbre than the preceding section. The dance has more depth to it. There is more open attraction between them, there being only the two of them. There are moments of casualness mixed with sudden moments of heat and intensity. On the surface, their flirtation is carried on in nice terms, but there is a sure feeling of lust underneath. The boy is very happy to have a girl all to himself—a piece of good luck—and the girl is quite content with him. He makes no rude or violent movements, and she is drawn to him. They make a good-looking pair. Finally he pays for her drink, and, arm in arm, they start for the door.

Transition of music and mood to next quality. As they leave, slowly, music dies and alters.

Slow . . . torchy, somewhat low-down, but pleasant. Not sentimental or romantic at all. Blues. . . .

Sudden break in mood at reentrance of three figures . . . same in music . . . transition to theme of completion, and constant rise in music as each incident provokes further antagonism between the three sailors until it breaks off at the three variations.

Starts here . . .

grows . . .

grows . . .

higher . . .

breaks off.

At this very moment, the Brunette and the two sailors reappear. Evidently she has broken down before their charm and persistence, and the three are returning for a drink together, in a happy joking mood. They spy the one sailor who is trying to make his escape with the girl "all his own." They nab him in time, when upon he returns and introduces his girl to his two friends. They are very happy to have another girl to share among them. The two girls know each other and go down stage for a bundle full of giggles and mischievousness. They realize that they have the advantage because there are only two of them to three men . . . that if they play their cards right they can rule the evening. Meanwhile the three men are standing apart, kind of sizing each other up again, inwardly preparing for the competition there will be for the girls. The competition underplays the whole of this new climaxing section, building constantly to a higher note each moment. The men from here on seize every opportunity to show off, not only for the girls but for their buddies as well. The girls encourage this rivalry by playing one against the other and by playing with all three.

The five reenter the bar. There is a scuffle to determine who is to escort which girl, a scramble for seats, and a conflict over who to sit next to whom. There is a frantic effort on the part of each to pay for the girls' drinks. There is a mad scramble to light their cigarettes. When they dance, there is continuous cutting in, and reshuffling of partners. Finally each sailor alone tries to show off how well he can dance. Each wants the attention; they vie for the center of the floor. The action grows more and more rough until it reaches a point at which they are on the verge of fighting. The girls intercede, and, after a moment's consideration, back two of them off the floor to allow the remaining one to show his stuff first. He gives the other two a look of triumph: they return sneers and smirks (this occurs between and after each solo dance). He starts his dance.

These three solo dances form the highlight of the ballet. Each sailor is given a chance to dance for the girls. Each dance is brilliant, flashy and technical enough to be showy, imaginative enough to project three distinct personalities. Each should be different musically and in quality. None of them is long, but each is full enough to be a complete variation in itself, practically a tour-de-force dance. They cannot be described; they must be danced. Each sailor, however, has his own personal style and type of movement, which can be presented. The first is the most bawdy, rowdy, boisterous of the three. He exploits the extrovert vulgarity of sailors, the impudence, the loudness, the get-me-how-good-I-am. When he finishes, instead of the other two fighting to go next, each wants the other to go first. Finally, the second yields and dances. His dance is very different in quality . . . the music is lighter, gayer, more happy-go-lucky, come-what-may. His movements are more naïve, lovable; there is more warmth, humor, and almost wistfulness about him. At last, the third dances. His keynote is his intensity. There is a feeling of the Spanish or Latin about him. There are swift, sudden movements, a strong passion and violence, an attractive flasbiness and smoldering quality:

When they are finished, there is a moment's pause. The girls really get to work on them. Now comes a fast kind of finale-coda dance. It picks up from where the excitement broke off, and before the three dances. The vitality and concentration of the excitement grows. The dance becomes hotter, almost a furious lindy hop. The girls are whirled from one man to the next, are snatched from one to the other. The boys become more violent in their contact with one another; they push, and shove and nudge until finally it happens—one shoves another too hard and a fight breaks out. Before the girls can stop it, it is a real knock-down, rough-and-tumble, bang-away fight. They jump at each other, they swing and duck, they dive and tackle and heave and throw each other. The two girls stand near-by, frightened (the situation has gone further than they intended). The boys are in a heap on the floor, arms, legs, heads, bodies entangled and weaving; grunts, groans, heaves and swings, kicks and jerks—they struggle and pant and pull and push. Suddenly one gets flung off the pile, and he rolls fast across the floor, hitting the two girls in the shins and knocking them flat. Ignoring them completely, he dives back into the mêlée. The girls help each other to their feet, shocked and furious. They rub their sore spots and stamp their feet for attention, to no avail: the men are too busy fighting. They both spy one free head, and together, they smack it with their bags. Then they turn and exit, walking haughtily, angrily down the street. The smacked head turns in time to see them exit. After many futile attempts, he finally gets the others to stop struggling. They look around. No push. They slowly disentangle themselves and get to their feet. They walk to the door and look resumption of competitive theme on higher scale . . .

building . . .

building to this climax where it breaks, wild and loose and whooping.

bang . . . crash, etc.

quickly slowing up . . .

slow . . .

empty . . .
after-the-storm
feeling.

Recovery, and . . .

Return to same theme as in opening . . .
slow . . .
relaxed . . .

tired . . .

dreamy . . .

Same break as in entrance of first girl . . . perhaps a little more nasty.

It dies away . . .
quiets down . . .

slower . . .

slower . . . suspended . . .
Crash . . .
loud . . .
finis.

off one way. No one in sight. The other way. Nothing. Then they look at each other, take in their messed clothes, cock-eyed hats, dirty and bruised faces, hurt disappointed expressions. Then they smile, increasingly as they realize the humor, ridiculousness, and irony of the whole situation . . . their knocking themselves out so hard that the girls escape them. They laugh and smack each other on the back.

They pull themselves together and decide that what they need is a drink. They go back into the bar and order up three beers. They pick up their glasses and clink them in a mutual toast. They lift, drain, and plunk them back on the bar simultaneously. A moment of relaxation . . . a pause of tired satisfaction. . . . They choose to see who will pay, with the same intrigue and the same results. The "sucker" shakes his head but pays. The other two shake hands on swindling him again. Then the three saunter to the door to stand looking out at the night and the empty streets. One yawns, another stretches, and the third produces a stick of gum which he tears in three pieces, giving a part to each. Same routine of unwrapping and flipping the paper away, etc. Then they stand there, waiting, relaxed, chewing.

The Blonde enters from the left. She is very much like the Brunette in movement and shrewdness. The sailors stand motionless, their heads following her, their eyes sizing her up. She crosses the stage and just as she gets past them there is a general sudden movement of "Let's get into action", swiftly cut and held by a movement of "Hey, wait a minute—remember what just happened." They look at each other and relax. They watch her go off stage. Then, for each other's benefit, they shrug kind of bored, and start off in the direction opposite to that the girl took. There is a strong tendency to lag, and many looks off toward the girl. They get slower and slower, until finally they stop completely, watching each other, waiting for the first to make a move—one does, and bang—they are off down the street after the girl, boisterous, excited, swaggering, loud, and happy.

It is most unusual for a choreographer to be so articulate in literary language. That, in itself, is not necessarily a merit, for the story is meant ultimately to be watched on the stage, not to be read. But we may draw some relevant inferences from our acquaintance with the original script, provided we bear in mind that the actual performance is the artist's final statement. The question is always intriguing, and frequently asked: why a work of art materializes just as it does, when it assumes its final form; how much, to put it more specifically, is set and planned beforehand in a primary concept and how much of it is invented, altered, added and discarded during the process of realization? The scenario of Fancy Free describes action and factual circumstances; it is straight narrative in visual terms, without personal comment. Robbins says, for instance, "They dance down the street with typical sailor movements." The picture is complete, because it is so familiar. Emotional states such as: "she is drawn to him," are intimated with beautiful simplicity. Those modest words do not indicate at all a want of imagination or sensitivity, but they do express a candid confidence in the universal intelligibility, the essential likeness of emotional language, be it spoken or mimed or danced. There is a great deal of warmth and affection which is never demonstrated. For all the devil-may-care attitude in Fancy Free there is not a trace of cynicism anywhere. But Robbins's fear of sentimentality and grandiloquence is greater even than the need for emotional articulation. Edwin Denby also reminds us that "George Balanchine has mentioned a kind of angelic unconcern toward emotion as being perhaps a special charm of American dancers," and, one may add, of American choreographers as well.

In the effort to be emotionally and artistically honest in telling the story of three plain sailors on shore leave, the choreographer was compelled to abandon the standard vocabulary of the ballet. He did so with the perfect ease and confidence of one who does not doubt that he is right. And he was proved to be right. It is remarkable indeed that Robbins was capable, inexperienced though he was, of visualizing the whole ballet with such accuracy and explicitness before it went into production. For actually he was a mere beginner, and the authority and self-assurance with which he speaks in this first large-scale tryout are still amazing after several years of continual success.

Essentially Fancy Free, like almost all young artists' first creative work, is a self-portrait—not literally and specifically commitment to loyalty. Despite its deliberate casualness and laconic comedy treatment, the ballet reveals an affirmative and dependable moral attitude, again confirmed in Robbins's choreographic creations. It becomes obvious why Fancy offers more than a witty stage version of bar-manner sailor slang and random flirtations, why it is more than of extraordinary choreographic skill. The true significance of this work is the revelation of democratic human relations. The six fancy-free young people in this balletic microcosm are united by a similarity of spirit and feeling and "under all rough and tumble exterior, there is a real affection for one another," as Robbins remarks himself. There are moments of exquisite tenderness and instants of a moving, candid belief in the fundamental goodness of all people.

Fancy Free was prepared and executed in an exemplary spirit of collaboration among friends who were all about the same age. They were fully successful, for the ballet conveys the impression of being all of a piece and of one mind, tightly coherent and perfectly integrated, from the opening sound of a melancholy voice to the last wild chase into the void. Choreography, music, décor and dancing fulfill to the letter Robbins's demand for the "honest justification for any moment of action and for the observance of 'strict functional pose.'" The score, by the brilliant young conductor and dancer, Leonard Bernstein, follows the explicit directions of the libretto phase by phase, all the while preserving a captivating quality of fluent improvisation. The setting, by the young designer and co-director of the Ballet Theatre, Oliver Smith, built with a deliberate simplicity entirely conceived for and adapted to functional use in the choreography. The choreography is full of fast action and broad theatre, alternating lyrical passages and humorous nonchalance, but it is always essentially dancing, derived from the traditional training and subjected to formal discipline. And since it is eminently danceable material, the miniature drama involving the ballet's young characters is presented throughout in easily intelligible terms of movement. Between the individuals of this small forming ensemble exists a rapport of affectionate, mutual responsibility which creates an atmosphere of complete security transcending the factual relationships of the action proper. This becomes even more obvious in the ballet Interplay which has no story to determine specific social or emotional contacts. The original cast of Fancy Free fitted to perfection since the ballet was virtually made to their measure. The three sailors, Robbins, Lang and Kriza, reveal their individuality, under the formality of sailor suit and manners, in the three solos with tion for top accomplishment, accompanied by an almost intuitive understanding of the need for teamwork. Applied to the ballet audience it explains the candid pride and genuine affection with which they participate in the performance. Interplay reflects the indubitable analogy (and not only in the physical nature of the profession) between the American athlete and the American ballet dancer. And if the relationships between the members of the ensemble are superficial, they are nevertheless morally valid, that is, reliable, honest and sincere. These qualities are obvious in the whole dance pattern, and more acutely in the dancing itself, and most strikingly in the personality of the dancers. And although there are some outstanding performances in solos and rather tricky pas de deux, the ensemble remains a democratic, homogeneous, perfectly blended whole.

Facsimile (Book: Jerome Robbins. Music: Leonard Bernstein. Setting: Oliver Smith. Costumes: Irene Sharaff) is some Robbins's first and only excursion into the realm of psychology. It is a brief and futile episode, emotionally involving "three insecure people" in a triangular adventure without avail and purpose. Its three protagonists, The Woman, The Man and Another Man, are characters without core or substance, defined by the choreographer with the following motto from Ramon y Cajal: "Small inward treasure does he possess who, to feel alive, needs every hour the tumult of the street, the emotion of the theatre, and the small talk of society." On this theme Robbins composes a number of variations which paraphrase emotional impotence, morbid frustration, neurotic exhibitionism and empty social sophistication. It proceeds with an uncompromising directness which is at once shocking and admirable. His merciless "choreographic observation," as he calls it himself, makes it obvious that he neither loves nor pities the repugnant characters of his own creation. This radical rejection leaves us somewhat at a loss to the author's essential thesis and thereby weakens the impact of his cutting and sardonic comment. He offers no moral point, no positive statement, no normal standard to establish the position and clarify the significance of the ballet's fortunate characters. The motivation for their behavior is, in effect, that they are neurotics, insecure and irresponsible. As a selection on our time it is thin and as a psychological subject is rather superficial. But in spite of these critical reservations, Facsimile is a tight and thoroughly absorbing drama.

This is due to a frankly theatrical treatment which derives astonishing fullness of dramatic life from an essentially barren and static plot. The interest and originality of the ballet excellently serves its purpose, although it does not add anything new in style or invention to the composer's former offering. Smith, again the third collaborator, designed a set with a wonderful sense of space and atmosphere. The style is as typical and valid a product of our time as Facsimile is, since both ballets are dealing with familiar representations of the choreographer's own generation. But for all artistic potentialities, Facsimile is less eloquent than See because it has less to convey in vital substance and conviction. Although the subject of Facsimile seems to have a profounder meaning, it is actually an artificial work, playing with emotional stock situations and using a psychological standard vocabulary. However, the very weakness of the ballet, Robbins demonstrates his extraordinary theatrical talent, his capacity to create and sustain a climate of tension and to hold performers and audience in its spell. Facsimile is the most recent of Robbins's works, the most recent to be conceived as an individual work of art. His other choreographic activities fall into the category of "show business"; they reveal nothing that was not possible to the choreographer before, nor do they indicate the direction of his creative endeavor. The expectations, therefore, are high; for, as Edwin Denby states unequivocally, "Robbins's choreographic genius, after his new Facsimile can be no doubt."

Robbins's ballets, though quite original, were not at all indicative precedents. With the works of Loring and Tudor, ballet had gradually developed into a sensitive theatrical medium, and the clan of the conservetophiles had expanded into a vast modern theatre. While the classical repertory remained the supreme balletic standards, modern ballets in a contemporary sense were no longer revolutionary or even risky. As long as a production was theatrically sound and effective, a response was guaranteed. But Robbins had been an untried newcomer in the ranks of the dancers. As a soloist he had proved the extent of his capacities; as a choreographer he constituted a considerable risk for the company. For no ballet organization dared to disregard the relationship between offering and audience. On the outcome of Robbins's efforts depended to a great extent the future chances of similar ventures to be undertaken by equally unknown, and possibly equally talented, choreographers. The great surprise about Robbins's success was not so much the revelation of an unusual talent, but also his sure command of the dance medium and his professional grasp of the theatrical métier. Here was evidence that the young generation had matured in experience; the ballet directors were convinced that it was an artistic policy to trust young choreographers with the creation of a modern repertory, and within a short span of years other promising new names appeared on the roster of the leading companies. John Taras, Todd Bolender, Antonia Cobos, Ruthanna Boris and Michael Kidd established themselves as artists of unquestionable proficiency.

Michael Kidd was born in New York City in 1918. He studied ballet with Vilzak-Schollar and Muriel Stuart, danced with the Metropolitan Opera Ballet and the Ballet Caravan and is assistant director and soloist with Eugene Loring's Dance Players. He joined the Ballet Theatre in 1942, revived Billy the Kid, in which he danced the title role and left the company when the conspicuous success of his choreographic debut called the attention of Broadway to this new talent. In background endeavor and achievement Michael Kidd is as consummately American as Jerome Robbins. He has the same directness and sincerity, the same natural and relaxed sense of humor, the same keen intelligence and gift of observation, the same friendly and affectionate trade with his fellows. Like Robbins, he is an accomplished dancer, though perhaps with a sharper edge and more comment in his characterizations. He is sensitive without being sentimental and sophisticated without becoming artificial, as he demonstrated in creating for himself the part of the Handyman in On Stage!

On Stage! (Music: Norman Dello Joio. Setting: Oliver Smith. Costumes: Alvin Colt) is a slight and touching fantasy about a ballet rehearsal and an audition, a handyman and a timid little dancer, and its great merit is that, for all its pink sweetness, it never loses its bite and humor. The scene is set on the bare stage of a theatre before, during and after the rehearsal of a ballet called The Captive Princess and Her Hero. The stage-frightened little girl in Pink fails miserably in her audition for the ballet master; meanwhile the grand ballet gets under way, brilliantly and magnificently. The handyman and the little dancer daydream themselves into the leading parts in the amusing and heartwarming key scene of the ballet. Encouraged by the handyman, the little girl overcomes her fear and nervousness, and while she is dancing with the lightness and ease of a dream, the handyman calls the ballet master and the company to watch her fine performance. Everything ends well for her, and the handyman remains on the stage in Chaplinesque loneliness. This rather conventional synopsis does not at all convey the qualities of charm and warmth, of good humor and fluid imagination which distinguish this piece. The plot is developed with a fairy-tale simplicity; its originality is in the telling of the story, not in its subject.

Structurally the work consists of two separate parts which are but loosely connected, one choreographed as a classical ballet displaying impersonal glamour and technical brilliance, the other directed as a dramatic pantomime stressing the human and personal character of the protagonists. Both actions are skilfully held together in the framework of a very realistically staged rehearsal with people who smoke and talk and play the piano. The choreography of the central ballet about the Captive Princess and Her Hero is interesting and imaginatively spiced with a trace of vulgarity and good, sound showmanship. In general style it is a parody on ballet manners and mannerisms with little comment and much wit, performed with considerable gusto, speed and athletic vigor. Its formal line is consistent, if not subtle, gaining in clarity as the ballet progresses from burlesque to more abstract choreographic design. The parts of the Princess and the Hero, danced by Nora Kay and John Kriza from the première to this day, have been superbly done, with secret amusement and keen intelligence which convey a peculiar flavor of sophistication to their parody.

The story of the little girl and the handyman is obviously meant to be the main action of the piece, although this appears in its emotional scope, rather than in its physical range. Its two lovable protagonists are of the same human mettle, genuine, unassuming and quite real. Although they seem especially invented for Janet Reed and Michael Kidd, subsequent changes in casting have proved that both parts are solid in substance and firm in structure. Their ephemeral relationship is handled with infinite tact and delicacy, at once casual and sincere, playful and affectionate. The girl's drama is touching and plausible, with enough poignant heartbreak to give emotional interest to a conventional happy ending. The part benefited in the original casting by Janet Reed's radiant personality, her intimate charm and her exquisite performance. The handyman is an engaging and versatile character, part clown, part deus ex machina, part carefree boy, part ageless wisdom. It is a character of perennial theatrical validity, created with an intuitive assurance and an unfailing sense of timing quite remarkable in so inexperienced an artist.

Norman Dello Joio composed a fine score which corresponds to an amazing degree to the particular moods and varied actions of the ballet, without becoming artificial or contrived. It is fresh and thoroughly enjoyable music with moments of frank persiflage and moments of pensive lyricism. Oliver Smith designed a setting whose theatrical perfection is its modesty and inconspicuousness, serving and clarifying the ballet's development in space.

This ballet is Michael Kidd's only contribution to the repertory today. But his first activity on Broadway must be mentioned here because his choreography and ensemble direction in Finian's Rainbow (1947) give evidence of serious progress and a resourceful talent. Unlike most other ballet choreographers who treat Broadway assignments as a major source of income and a minor form of art, Kidd did not strive for a sure-fire formula of success. On Stage! had reached the limits of what could be achieved on the ballet stage without destroying the medium or repudiating its essential foundation. The crucial point is not the transformation, or even the distortion, of the strict classical regime into a different form of dance, but the departure from the dance altogether. Finian's Rainbow shows almost a reversal of the customary pattern. Into On Stage! Michael Kidd introduced a considerable amount of unballetic material, of straight acting and incidental speech. In the musical play he used dancing extensively, and he even supplied a mute girl—superbly performed by the young Anita Alvarez—with a leading part entirely and delightfully conceived in pure dance terms. Finian's Rainbow is not only the maturer work, but in absolute terms of value a theatre piece of responsibility, integrity and impeccable style.

Jerome Robbins and Michael Kidd were not the only choreographic beginners to be given their first chance with Ballet Theatre. While still a dancer with the company, the young John Taras staged the ballet Graziana, in 1945, thus making a highly promising début. John Taras was born in New York City, in 1918, studied ballet with Michel Fokine and Mme Anderson-Ivantzova and at the School of American Ballet and trained as an actor with the Washington Square Players of New York. He danced in the Fokine Ballet, the American Ballet Caravan, Catherine Littlefield's Philadelphia Ballet Company, the American Ballet and joined Ballet Theatre as soloist in 1942. His dancing has native elegance and style, ease and authority, but also a tendency to appear detached, rather than inspired.

Graziana (Music: Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in G Major. Costume: Alvin Colt) is in the abstract classical style. Movements: Allegro, Adagio.

small corps de ballet. In its frank affirmation of strict classicism and in certain effective details of invention, the work suggests Balanchine as master and model. But it is not derivative, strained or pretentious, it has a happy quality of youth and its transparent spatial geometry is easy to follow and pleasant to behold. Its musical quality, however, is derived from the more obvious suggestions of the score, rather than from its essential Mozartian spirit, and there is a lack of penetration which deprives the work of sustained expressive power. Nevertheless, it is a composition of decided merit and a worthy addition to the classical repertory of the Ballet Theatre.

The young choreographer was less fortunate with the choreography for Camille (1946), which he did for the Original Ballet Russe, and The Minotaur (1947), which he staged for the Ballet Society. In both works his style remained somewhat self-consciously within the limitations of formal patterns and failed to achieve truly dramatic expression. His sensitivity to lyrical qualities, as in Camille, and his interest in abstract organization, as in The Minotaur, seem to indicate the direction of his artistic development.

The Ballet Theatre III

THE ACHIEVEMENT

THE BALLET THEATRE, as envisioned by Richard Pleasant, was to include the best of the classical repertory as well as new works. At the start they were especially fortunate in obtaining Michel Fokine to work with the company on revivals of Les Sylphides (1940), Carnaval (1940), Spectre de la Rose (1941) and Petrouchka (1942); he created, before his death in 1942, Russian Soldier and Bluebeard. Anton Dolin restaged Swan Lake (1940) and Giselle (1940) and George Balanchine contributed Waltz Academy (1944) and more recently Theme and Variations. This listing looks more impressive than it really is. Carnaval and Spectre have not been performed in years, nor have they been missed much. Russian Soldier, a grim, dramatic narrative about the dreams of a Russian soldier dying on the battlefield, set to Prokofiev's symphonic suite, Lieutenant Kije, with particularly fine settings and costumes by Mstislav Dobujinsky, did not survive long. Bluebeard, with Jacques Offenbach's charming score, and elegantly perfumed settings and sophisticated costumes by Marcel Vertès, is still in the repertory. The ballet is an enormous production, in two preludes, four acts and three interludes. It has a very long, very complicated, very silly opera-buffa story, involving a great number of characters who engage but mild interest. The touch of the master is unmistakable: there is an abundance of invention and wonderful detail, there are many hilarious comedy episodes and there is much delightful dancing. There is also the impression that the substance for a perfect little farce has been blown up considerably beyond its inherent capacity.

Petrouchka was an unforgettable dance drama of extraordinary theatrical power, which has all the qualities that would seem to make it one of the great classics of the modern ballet: an exceptional book, Stravinsky's distinguished score, Fokine's masterly choreography and Benois's fine scenic investiture. But without Fokine's inspiration the work has strangely lost its life and sparkle, like its puppets without the Charlatan's magic. It is, by now, merely the shadow of its former glory, dull, artificial, stuffed with sawdust and out of respect for Fokine it should not be performed in its present state of disintegration. That leaves Les Sylphides as Fokine's lasting legacy to Ballet Theatre, and a generous one it is. There is no need to analyze once again a creation which has become the sublime symbol of the ballet and which remains indeed the great choreographer's imperishable artistic manifesto. Les Sylphides, and to the certain degree Swan Lake as well, has become the absolute test of excellence in the classical medium. (What we call classical ballet today is actually the contemporary interpretation of romanticism, formulated in terms of the strict academic disciplines.) For the present generation Les Sylphides has established a referable standard, at once the summation, for our time, of balletic tradition and the abstraction; presumably for all time, of its essential spirit.

By the time Ballet Theatre had completed its first season, it had established itself as a vital and vigorous American company. A year later, on its first transcontinental tour, 1941-1942, the company had become a Hurok Attraction, frankly advertised as "the greatest in Russian Ballet." Richard Pleasant, unwilling to compromise on essential issues, resigned and shortly after joined the armed forces. Eugene Loring, the most forceful American in the ensemble, left the company, and with him The Great American Goof disappeared from the repertory and, soon after, Billy the Kid. Obeah was dropped when the Negro unit was disbanded. On the other hand, the Russian companies supplied several new dancers, upsetting the precarious balance of nationalities to the advantage of the Russian contingent. Two great "Russian" ballerinas, Irina Baronova and Alicia Markova, joined the company and were unmistakably advertised as stars. The result of these changes was not a deterioration in quality, but decidedly a change in character. Ballet Theatre had become the "Ballet Russe d'Amérique," as Margaret Lloyd said. Thus was created the confusing situation from which the ballet in this country is still suffering. It would be difficult to argue with Mr. Hurok when he explains in his memoirs, Impresario, that the American public was conditioned to Russian Ballet. Indeed, he himself had devoted years of consistent promotion to achieve this very result and he could hardly be blamed for wanting to reap the benefit of his endeavors. But it must not be forgotten that Richard Pleasant, too, had proved his point, and entirely without the benefit of Mr. Hurok's superior managerial experience and organization. Indeed the foundation then laid was so sound and solid that the Ballet Theatre, despite frequent changes in directorship, management and artists, maintained lets, Bluebeard and Russian Soldier (not in the present repertory). Bronislava Nijinska revived La Fille Mal Gardée (not in the present repertory), Anton Dolin revived Swan Lake, Princess Aurora, Giselle and created Pas de Quatre (now performed in Keith Lester's version). George Balanchine produced Apollo, Waltz Academy (not in the present repertory) and Theme and Variations, and Agnes de Mille, Obeah (Black Ritual) (not in the present repertory), Three Virgins and a Devil and Tally-Ho. Leonide Massine revived Capriccio Espagnol, Boutique Fantastique and Three-Cornered Hat, and produced three new ballets, Aleko, Don Domingo and Mlle Angot, of which only Aleko remained. David Lichine created Helen of Troy and Fair at Sorochinsk (not in the present repertory) and revived Graduation Ball. Antony Tudor offered Dark Elegies, Jardin aux Lilas, Judgment of Paris, Gala Performance, Pillar of Fire, Romeo and Juliet, Dini Lustre and Under-tow. Adolph Bolm contributed an ill-fated version of Firebird (not in the present repertory) and Peter and the Wolf. Jerome Robbins produced Fancy Free, Interplay and Facsimile, Michael Kidd On Stage!, John Taras Graziana and Simon Semenoff Gift of the Magi (neither of the last two is in present repertory).

A brief appraisal of the repertory may be useful. The classical department is strong, although limited in scope. New ballets in the classical idiom are badly needed, not only to balance the repertory, but also to maintain the fine discipline and pure academic style of soloists and corps de ballet. It is regrettable that Balanchine's Waltz Academy disappeared, but his Apollo has been revived and Theme and Variations is a masterpiece. John Taras's Graziana, though pleasant enough, offered an inadequate substitute for Balanchine's masterful maturity in similar treatments. Dolin's Pas de Quatre was a little masterpiece, infinitely superior to Lester's version which is used at present. No Massine ballet of consequence is left; Don Domingo and Mlle Angot deserve oblivion. Fokine's Bluebeard and Lichine's Helen of Troy are legitimate balletic entertainment, but hardly more. De Mille's Three Virgins and Tally-Ho nicely balance an evening's more serious fare, but neither does full justice to her superior choreographic talents. Michael Kidd's On Stage! is a pleasant new addition, but Semenoff's Gift of the Magi may best be forgotten. By far the most substantial modern contributions to the present repertory have been ballets of Jerome Robbins and Antony Tudor.

The Ballet Theatre had two exceptional chances to build up an outstanding classical repertory. It began, as we know, with an ambitious but sound program, which included Les Sylphides, Swan Lake and Giselle; the other traditional ballets disappeared as they were created. In 1941, after the Latin American tour of the American Ballet, Lincoln Kirstein, as Director General and George Balanchine, in the capacity of Director of Choreography, had intended to take the ballets composed for this tour all over North America. The war made this impossible. The repertory of the American Ballet at this time included Concerto Barocco, Ballet Imperial, Jeu de Cartes, Baiser de la Fée, Errante, Serenade and all the ballets Balanchine had created in the previous seven years. In order to preserve this unique work, according to Lincoln Kirstein, it was offered to Lucia Chase for the Ballet Theatre. At that time, in 1943, J. Alden Talbot was managing director of the company and it was decided that none of these works was suitable for inclusion in the Ballet Theatre repertory. By a strange coincidence this refusal virtually saved the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo which needed new works, and it also affected Ballet Theatre which was in a similar, if less desperate, situation. The new ballets which Leonide Massine and David Lichine contributed were traditional only in the technical sense, but they had no classical feeling or intent and they did not enrich the repertory in any way. The only new, strictly classical composition of style, wit and distinction was Anton Dolin's charming Pas de Quatre which, after the choreographer had left the company, was unfortunately replaced by Keith Lester's rather trivial version of the subject. Dolin's presence as dancer, choreographer and personality helped immensely in maintaining Ballet Theatre's classical prestige, and his revivals of Swan Lake and Giselle have dignity, nobility and impeccable style. Later Ballet Theatre called upon George Balanchine's services. In 1944 he created Waltz Academy, a lively, highly entertaining ballet, displaying a veritable fireworks of technical invention and skill, and in 1947 he composed Theme and Variations.

Theme and Variations (Music: Peter I. Tchaikowsky's Suite No. 3 for Orchestra. Setting and Costumes: Woodman Thompson) is an eminently theatrical work; it has suspense, drama, speed and imagination. It is an abstract composition and there is no factual content or literal meaning of any kind. There is, however, an alternation of action and reaction, derived from movement tensions, which makes the visual drama more exciting than any story. In form and structure the ballet is of a compelling, almost mathematically exact logic. The profusion of intricate and startling detail is subordinated to a master plan, gradually revealed as one dynamic phrase infallibly follows another to the rousing terminating climax. Yet there is nothing artificial or forced in the dance invention. In fact, the dance impetus is as spontaneous and strong in the minor detail as in the developed choreographic line. It looks as if it were composed and executed without strain of effort, brilliantly improvised on the spectacular score. Soloists and corps de ballet attack the exorbitantly exacting task with spirit and conviction and perform magnificently; the main soloists, Alicia Alonso and Igor Youskevitch, appear matchless in the grand manner. The only disturbing element is Woodman Thompson's busy and pretentious décor which tends to confuse the ballet's transparent pattern.

This extraordinary ballet has a double significance. It is a crowning masterpiece of Balanchine's strict, abstract classicism as first manifested in Serenade (1934), clearly reaffirmed in Concerto Barocco (1941) and eventually crystallized in the flawless beauty of Dances Concertantes (1944). By the same token it is a triumph for the American dancers in the mastery of the classical medium. It is hard to decide who is more to be admired in this fine cooperation, the choreographer who so surely and intimately enters into the native genius of the dancers, or the dancers who so perfectly respond to his creative inspiration. There is, throughout, an awareness of mutual obligation and a reason for mutual respect and gratitude. Undoubtedly Balanchine is "more than anyone else the founder of the American classical style," as Edwin Denby says. One may supplement Denby's statement with the observation that the American dancers are definitely liberated from the last literal remnants of alien tradition. They have found their own legitimate equivalent in style.

In the first place, the several corps de ballet of Ballet Theatre deserve high praise, particularly for their work in abstract ballets like Les Sylphides and Theme and Variations, in which they support and justify the ballerina's performance, yet also assume a function with meaning and identity in the total pattern of the composition. American dancers are splendid material for group choreography because of their intuitive understanding of collective discipline and their amazing facility for adjustment to the general tenor of the ensemble in which they participate. This may be suggested as a plausible explanation for the fact that the continually recast ensembles succeeded, by and large, in preserving a distinctive character of uniformity over the years. In fact, nine years have passed since Michel Fokine rehearsed and staged Les Sylphides with the original Ballet Theatre ensemble and the work has not only maintained its period integrity, its clean choreographic pattern, its subtle quality of feeling and movement, but it seems to have matured from within, as it were, to even fuller meaning and greater poetic power.

The corps de ballet is a complex and very delicate organism, and it should not be confused with, for example, an opera chorus with which it shares only the anonymity. In the pre-Diaghilev ballets the corps de ballet was conventionally used as a mobile background or a sort of living décor to enhance and glorify the dancing of the principals. The dancers in the group totally surrendered their individual identity; they needed neither personality nor talent, and required a minimum of technical equipment. However, in the modern ballet the ensemble assumes a greater choreographic importance. In many newer works there exists an active, functional relationship between group and soloists that demands an equal measure of expressive projection from both and consequently a responsible participation of the individual member. Perfect coordination of the ensemble movement, the fundamental principle of all group choreography, is based more on human intelligence than on mechanical drill. Lincoln Kirstein appropriately speaks of the "democratization" of the modern corps de ballet. In our days the talented dancer stands a fair chance of surviving as an individual the inevitable pressure of the mass and of rising from the ranks into prominence. Ballet Theatre's Alicia Alonso and Nora Kaye are illustrious examples.

But, although several of the leading dancers in the Ballet Theatre company have similarly risen from the ranks, it is still an unusual accomplishment for a classic ballerina. Tradition has it that great ballerinas are foreordained, born to their destiny and raised to fulfill it. Many, indeed, were famous ballerinas before they were fully grown women, let alone fully matured artists. The general apprenticeship and stage experience afforded in a corps de ballet is not equivalent to the intense, specialized training devoted to the task of transforming a child prodigy into a true ballerina. It is infinitely harder to break through the established routine in a large ballet company by a slow, step-by-step fulfillment of a still unconfirmed vocation. Talent, patient determination and hard work may eventually attract attention and reward. But the ballerina's quality is not a matter of exceptionally good dancing; it is an absolute quality which miraculously reveals itself even if it is perfected in performance. Although ballet history serves and celebrates the memory of many outstanding soloists, our concept of the ballerina dates from the romantic period and is preserved in the aristocratic tradition of the classical ballet. Until this day these traditional roles are considered the supreme challenge and test for the dancer who aspires to program could have been preserved under such adverse conditions.

How was this miracle achieved? If any one person is to be thanked for it, it should be the original director, Richard Pleasant, who conceived and formulated the basic principles for the young enterprise so soundly and completely that they turned out to be indestructible. The first rushing impetus of creative enthusiasm gathered around this man had such impact that it was never quite forgotten. But the responsibility and the realistic task of carrying the company through several serious crises have rested mainly with Antony Tudor and Lucia Chase. While it is comparatively easy to estimate Tudor's merit and influence, it is very difficult to do full justice to Miss Chase. Materially the Ballet Theatre has existed largely because of her support. With lavish generosity Miss Chase has employed her personal wealth to cover the organization's enormous deficits. If the actual figures involved, no matter how considerable, are not the outsider's concern, the sponsor's admirable moral attitude deserves to be a matter of public record. Her directorial decisions regarding artistic policy, quality and integrity have never been dictated by economic considerations and never by any abuse of power. She has not considered or directed the company as her personal property, but as a cultural mission to which she has dedicated herself with purpose and devotion. As a soloist with Ballet Theatre since its foundation and as one of its co-directors since 1945, she is closely identified with the life of this company, with its mistakes and its failings as well with its proud achievements and successes.

Her connection with the ballet is of old standing. Lucia Chase showed an early interest in the theatre. She studied dramatics at the Theatre Guild under Rouben Mamoulian, received a thorough ballet training from Mikhail Mordkin and joined the newly organized Mordkin Ballet, in 1937, as prima ballerina. She made her professional debut in the first American performance of The Sleeping Beauty in her home town of Waterbury, Connecticut, and acquired a wide classic repertory, including the roles of Giselle, the Fisherman's Wife in Tchernepine's The Goldfish and Lizette in La Fille Mal Gardée. These long years of work and performance, exclusively in the strict classical regime, formed her taste and account for her ill-advised insistence on appearing in such works as Les Sylphides, Pas de Quatre and Petrouchka. Miss Chase has not the radiant personality, the magic and the style of the great classical ballerina, although she herself seems to be unaware of these limitations. It is regrettable that so genuine and fine an artist should deliberately provoke the same criticism all the time, since she s excellent in parts suited to her personality. She is a comedienne (Tally-Ho, Judgment of Paris) and her stark character portrait of the older sister in Pillar of Fire is a distinguished performance. The tact, the modesty and the utterly feminine bearing of this New England lady make it hard to visualize her as the responsible administrator of so large and complex an artistic organization as Ballet Theatre. Yet, if she is not a person with the aristocratic intolerance of a Diaghilev, with the powerful energies of a Colonel de Basil, with the elegant nostalgic grandeur of the Marquis de Cuevas, with the solid business acumen of Sergei Denham, with the vision and the drive of Lincoln Kirstein, she is a person of determination who has proved beyond any possible doubt that she has not bought, but honestly earned, the privilege of her key position in the ballet world. Perhaps her modesty, though laudable, is not altogether a virtue in view of her directorial function. Her strength expresses persistence rather than initiative, faith rather than passion, continuation rather than innovation.

There is, no doubt, a lack of color, personality and authority in the conduct of the company's program which has become more noticeable over the years. This is not manifest in the single performance but in the cumulative effect of the season-to-season effort. One is never quite sure what to expect next and where the company is headed. If there is a progressive trend, its direction is haphazard and unpredictable. If there is a tendency toward consolidation and stabilization, its character needs to be clarified. On the whole, the Ballet Theatre has shown a greater capacity to assimilate heterogeneous elements and to reconcile divergent styles than any other ballet company. But it has left a wider margin of tolerance than is compatible with a consistent artistic policy. Its stated principle of catholicity sounds good enough in theory because it may be taken as a promise and a challenge and an assertion of good will toward all those who contribute creatively to the ballet of our time. In practice, however, an excess of idealism and tolerance leads to a laxity of standards and a loss of critical authority. In periods of uncertainty, transition and revaluation, like the present, the threat of cultural anarchy is very real and must be met with resolute aesthetic leadership. A cultural institution—and that is what every ballet company should be proud to be—assumes aesthetic responsibilities commensurate with its influence. Any ballet presented, and the way it is presented, amounts to a commitment for the future. It may not be the intention of Ballet Theatre to set up its policy and practice in categorical statements. Nevertheless, the public is entitled to expect its directors to present an unequivocal artistic program, according to the best of their collective ability.

The distinctive character of any ballet organization is determined, for better or for worse, by the personality of its director. For fear of being dominated by one individual, the Ballet Theatre went too far in the opposite direction. Its composite character is a summation of Miss Chase and her many collaborators—an administrative co-director, the stage designer and producer, Oliver Smith; an artistic administrator, Antony Tudor; an artistic committee of seven; and a board of eight directors. That is a pretty unwieldy governing staff. It is never quite clear who makes the policy of Ballet Theatre and who controls it. The advantages of broad artistic collaboration are obvious, but so are its shortcomings. These, however, are minor reservations compared to Ballet Theatre's extraordinary record of achievements. In John Martin's summary: "There is no denying that it is a superb company, with great distinction of style, backed by substantial technical skill, personal pulchritude, an awareness of the theatre and a sense of artistic responsibility." Let there be no doubt: Ballet Theatre is America's finest company. But let there be no illusion either: we have no assurance that it will last.

The Dance Players

THE BALLET INTERNATIONAL

THE DANCE PLAYERS and the Ballet International were two of the many ballet companies which were unable to compete with the large commercial companies and survived only a short time. Dance Players was essentially a continuation of Kirstein's Ballet Caravan with its interest in Americana; Ballet International was more cosmopolitan and more ambitious.

The Dance Players, "an all-American company offering dance plays on American themes," appeared in the spring season of 1942. Through the initiative of Mrs. Winthrop B. Palmer, who also sponsored the company, it had been organized in 1941 under the direction of Eugene Loring, with a group of fifteen dancers, including Lew Christensen, Michael Kidd, Joan McCracken and Janet Reed. This ensemble looked promising, including, as it did, several fine untried artists and three excellent experienced ones. Eugene Loring, of course, had demonstrated extraordinary talents as a dancer and choreographer, particularly as the creator and protagonist of the famous Billy the Kid. Other Loring ballets from the original Caravan repertory, Harlequin for President and City Portrait, the latter substantially revised, were taken over by the Dance Players.

From Kirstein's beginnings to Loring's conclusions was a consistent evolution. The American Ballet, with George Balanchine as main choreographer, has preserved the elegant style and aristocratic spirit of the classical theatrical dance, stressing the lyrical element rather than the dramatic one. The Ballet Caravan, inspired by Lincoln Kirstein, introduced the collaboration of predominantly American artists who set out to adapt the traditional technique to contemporary subjects and functions. The Dance Players went one step further by calling their ballets "dance plays" and presenting them frankly as danced and mimed drama. Although the physical and structural basis of their technique was the danse d'école, they also made free use of the modern expressional idiom. It was neither "modern" dance, nor pantomime, but essentially ballet as a lyrical drama.

Loring's enthusiasm for the expression of America in the dance is genuine; it is the spirit which animate in Billy the Kid and The Great American. G stimulated his imagination for Prairie and Ci was, to quote John Martin, "the first really o arise in the field of the American ballet." The c "American" style is not merely the result of k and the capacity to portray characteristic traits mirably the delicate problem of transforming ot tic and documentary data into genuine dance e applies to both his interpretations and his ch creative imagination endows all his work with t immediate human experience. In producing Bi model of the American genre, he kept the genu out falling into the clichés of movie Westerns. professional discipline to avoid empty acroba he had enough sense of humor to avoid sent above all, he had enough feeling for the theat nger of literary story-telling. This fine artistic led him to create the first native ballet of any ting a precedent whose effects can still be no cent productions. Loring's early training was s choreographic style is derived from theatri uses both characters and situations, not onl ect, but as elements in a dance composition. When Loring organized the Dance Players d considerable practice and a respected po e thing to qualify as a fine performer and thin an organization and quite another to ta onsibilities for an organization. Loring fou ad of a small team which was admirable in s on but lacking in ensemble training, stage aturity. These young people needed educati spiration, competence as much as enthusiasm sional seasoning as much as for rehearsing. ( o short to supply the necessary experience a sustained and conclusive success. Before it mpany presented some fine new ballets which regret that it did not survive. The repertory c llets.

Prairie (Book: after Carl Sandburg's poem. M llo Joio. Choreography: Eugene Loring. rcom. Costumes: Felipe Fiocca) is an Ame told in four movements.

First Movement—The Homesteaders: In our pic ups, moved by adventure, economic dream or he ss, came to the prairie lands of the great Middle West. Many moved, but a few remained to become the fathers, mothers and daughters of the new country. Second Movement—The Second Generation: The adventure of homesteading is over and the labor of husbandry remains. The descendants of the settlers seek more excitement than can be found on the land, and the daughter, now prodigal, stirs up the young people to turn towards the towns and cities. The movement away from the prairie grows and even the prodigal daughter comes terrified. Third Movement—Another Beginning: Cut off from the strength of the prairie, the daughter finds no meaning in existence and is unable to survive. Man, however, comes to her aid and teaches her to walk again, and they go off in search of the pioneering father and mother. Fourth Movement—New Cities and New People: They return to the land, not as homesteaders but as enlightened people who have learned the source of their strength and the cradle of their wisdom.

The content, the tenor and the moral of this synopsis are equally revealing. Clearly there was a deep need for such unequivocal and affirmative statement of belief in "the source of our strength." Quite different from the dramatic, essentially realistic narrative of Billy the Kid, this work was wider in emotional scope and more profound in significance. The program lists the Land, the Father, the Mother, the Daughter and Man. The protagonists, then, are symbols, indicating characteristic stations in the process of American self-realization. This fine composition was carried by genuine poetic feeling throughout, admirably sustained in the choreographic style; the academic technique conveyed to the dancing an effect of heightened importance and formal abstraction. Norman Dello Joio supplied an admirable score, inventive, colorful and highly danceable.

City Portrait (Book: Lincoln Kirstein. Music: Henry Brant. Settings and Costumes: Reginald Marsh) was originally produced in 1939 for the Ballet Caravan and substantially revised by the choreographer. The story is depressingly realistic.

Scene 1. The Street: The young daughter, having no space at home, spends her time in the unfriendly city street, where feebleness, sordidness and failure are ever before her. Scene 2. The Family in their Encement Home: Confined in too small quarters, the various members of the family annoy and irritate each other. One by one they rush out to the city street to escape beyond the reach of their mother's complaining tongue. Scene 3. Corner Appointment: The older daughter, having no privacy at home, meets her boy friend at the street corner. The unhappiness of her home life affects her disposition, and the young man, bored with her family preoccupation, leaves her for a more congenial companion. Scene 4. Men at Work: The father and the older daughter's boy friend are at work at the sewer. The sauciness of the young daughter irritates the father and colorful circus characters. The close-knit drama developed with a feeling of fatal inevitability and the pathetic resignation to an inescapable, irrational power of evil was a wonderful and gripping climax. It was this curious and unique story, rather than choreographic invention, which conveyed distinction to the work. The scenery was particularly striking and Britten's score had the same tense and haunting quality as the visual drama.

After the Dance Players was disbanded, Eugene Loring was engaged as a choreographer in Hollywood and he has since done the dances for several films, but due to the artistic situation of the film capital and the mechanics of film producing he has not yet had an opportunity to reveal the full measure of his creative potentialities.

The Ballet International was planned as a much larger venture than the Dance Players and when it was first announced in 1944 the reaction in professional circles was one of doubt and misgiving. There were already two full-sized companies in New York—the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo and the Ballet Theatre—and several smaller organizations. Between them the two large companies had pretty much absorbed the best dancers and fairly well balanced their respective competitive positions. It was feared that a third large company would either be reduced to presenting second-rate performers or that the thin top layer of outstanding dancers and choreographers would be spread even thinner. The two major companies had contracted for the only adequate theatres in New York; the new company would find itself without a suitable house. The older companies had established their own touring circuits throughout the country; the new one would have to fit an additional repertory into the already crowded season schedules. The ballet audience was limited and it was possible that there was a saturation point.

The Ballet International was to be a part of a comprehensive project, the Ballet Institute, conceived, sponsored and artistically directed by the Marquis George de Cuevas and founded as an educational non-profit organization in November 1943. The Ballet Institute was "created for the advancement of the art of the ballet and its allied arts; for the education of students in these arts and for the public appreciation of ballet."

Its announcement was suggestive and so generated every possible speculation. Too many ballets had been founded and failed before, despite the founders and the fabulous sums invested in them and again it was proved that the success of a depends on, first, an unequivocal and consistent artistic policy second, competent artists to carry it out, third, adequate technical facilities to present it, fourth, expert management to promote it and, finally, absolute centralization of command to coordinate it. Any weak link in this chain of efficiency is fatal. Even assuming that the Ballet International could meet these requirements, there still remained such unpredictable conditions as timing and public response.

As a first step toward the realization of his plans the Marquis bought a handsome theatre, the International, intended as a permanent home for both a school and the company. The combination of an academy and a living and working center under the same roof and the generous attitude of the Marquis seemed to promise what had been most lacking: the assurance of permanence. Actually the academy was the well-established Vilzak-Schollar School of the Ballet which functioned undisturbed before, during and after the Ballet International. Anatole Vilzak was ballet master of the company and his presence assured a high standard of technique and accuracy. The house, however, was too small to accommodate classrooms, living quarters and rehearsal space; the seating capacity was too limited to cover expenses and the stage was entirely inadequate for ballet performance. Hence Ballet International's own house, instead of being a secure base, turned out to be a heavy liability, both financially and technically.

The performing company had been assembled and had been rehearsing intensively for about half a year. Eleven ballets were eventually prepared by ten different choreographers: Edward Caton, Antonia Cobos, William Dollar, André Eglevsky, Vera Fokina, Leonide Massine, Bronislava Nijinska, Boris Romanoff, Simon Semenoff and Anatole Vilzak. Only three of these ballets were revivals from the traditional repertory; the others were novelties and several were daringly experimental.

But most of the ballets, although competently staged and well danced, were undistinguished. The ensemble never quite became a cohesive organism. Its weakness showed in its classical repertory; its Sylphides, for example, could not compare with the performances in the other local companies. Outstanding among the soloists were William Dollar, André Eglevsky and Francisco Moncion, Viola Essen, who has since deserted the stage for the film, and Marie-Jeanne, whose fine capacities were not fully used at present in the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Bronislava Nijinska demonstrated her choreographic authority in the masterly treatment of ensemble and groups in Actures at an Exhibition, with its theatrically effective décor by Boris Aronson. Sebastian was exciting theatre, with a strik-

The Musical Comedy

IN THE comparatively short period between the sensational success of the original Black Crook and its revival in 1929, the musical comedy had become a well-established form of popular entertainment. It had a safe and tried tradition of its own—slight fare on a lavish scale. Dancing was a popular feature in every musical from the days of the extravaganzas, and the success of such revues as the Ziegfeld Follies, John Murray Anderson's Greenwich Village Follies, J. K. Shubert's Passing Show, George White's Scandals and Earl Carroll's Vanities depended to a large extent on visual splendor and the appeal of well-built, well-trained dancing girls. Whatever plot the average musical had was only a pretext for a lavish stage show and a full quota of dance numbers.

These dance numbers were simply another kind of lavishness. Their function was to provide an attractive living décor, effectively arranged in intricate ornaments and decorative patterns. In terms of production technique, dancers were mechanical instruments; their qualification was a brief training which assured the selection of the fit and, beyond that, a certain degree of bodily control and group discipline. The immensely popular precision work of the Tiller Girls, who were imported wholesale from England in the early twenties, was the paradigm of this impersonal accuracy and mechanization as are the Rockettes at the Radio City Music Hall today. When Albertina Rasch presented a traditional ballet for the first time in Rio Rita (1927), it was appreciated as another kind of formal discipline, not as an expansion of the range of dance expression. Ballet technique was a welcome change from high-kicking, aerobatics and tap routines. There was a good market for ballet, since it was serviceable, reliable material and it was furnished producers in ready-made teams. During many years Albertina Rasch and her "theatrical enterprises" offered "units of from six to twenty-four Rasch Girls . . . appearing in vaudeville feature acts, in Broadway revues, on the screen and in motion-picture prologues," as the advertisements stated. Like the dancers themselves, the dance directors were usually highly skilled specialists with little creative ambition. They worked conscientiously as commercial artists, mostly concerned with the physical timing, placing and coordinating of the dance movements. If their routine arrangements had no truly choreographic significance, there was no qualified audience to object. And even when so important a figure as Fokine worked in the musical comedy, as he did during the twenties for Gertrude Hoffman, Gilda Gray and Ziegfeld, neither he nor the producers considered this work of any great artistic significance.

The change came slowly and not exclusively from the ballet world. Modern concert dancers like Charles Weidman, Josephine Simon and Sara Mildred Strauss, for instance, made the difficult transition from the intimate recital stage to revue choreography with a fine flair for the medium and with a sure grasp of its broader effects. But the signal departure in a new direction occurred only in 1936, when George Balanchine, then director and choreographer of the American Ballet at the Metropolitan Opera, accepted an assignment to stage the dances for the musical revue On Your Toes. The prestige of Balanchine's name could not fail to reach and impress a very wide public. There were skeptics in both camps, among the show-business experts and the ballet traditionalists. The success of this venture was a gratifying symptom of intelligent audience response. The extraordinary "production number," Slaughter on Tenth Avenue demonstrated strikingly that the ballet was not the supposed museum of past glory and elusive memories, but could be as lively and vital a medium as swing and hot jazz. Few people realized at the time that the difference between the customary conventional dance arrangement and Balanchine's choreography was not a matter of method but a matter of concept. Balanchine himself would have been the last person to attach particular importance to some pleasant work in a light vein which for him, too, was primarily commercial entertainment. When Edith J. R. Isaacs remarked in Theatre Arts that "with On Your Toes we may have come unknowingly upon a successor to the old musical," her wishful thinking anticipated the actual events by several years.

Today the dance situation in 1936—the year in which Balanchine created both Slaughter on Tenth Avenue and Gluck's Orpheus—seems historically remote. The dated voluptuousness of Scheherazade would have been a daring novelty on Broadway, and the satirical commentary of Nijinska's then twelve-year-old Train Bleu and Les Biches would have been topical at about that time. Ballet was an esoteric art for which the audience was narrowly limited both on and off Broadway and commercially it was a losing proposition. While the first American ballet groups were struggling for consolidation and recogdition, the musicals flourished easily on their ancient formula, using indiscriminately whatever dance specialties were available on soft soles, high heels or blocked shoes. In any case, while competent dancers were plentiful, good choreographers were scarce. Balanchine was unique, "the first choreographer of Broadway," as John Martin called him in a thoroughly affirmative review of I Married an Angel (1938). Balanchine, fortunately, choreographed several musicals—Babes in Arms (1937), Boys from Syracuse (1938), as well as the ones mentioned above—before he went on to further success in United Artists' Goldwyn Follies (1938). Although Balanchine reserved his more serious ambitions for the legitimate ballet, the elegance of his style always conveyed distinction to even the most trivial Broadway productions. It is probable, however, that the general audience does not respond quite as readily to his cosmopolitan sophistication as to the American idiom of Agnes de Mille whose Oklahoma! revolutionized the conventional musical comedy genre.

The production of Oklahoma! was clearly not conceived in a spirit of rebellion or intended as an experiment. It was a careful and competent adaptation of Lynn Riggs's Green Grow the Lilacs, done with more charm and less pretentiousness than the average musical. Agnes de Mille was commissioned to stage the dances because her ballet Rodeo happened to be suitably American in content or flavor, not because she had spent fifteen years' hard work at becoming an exceptional choreographer. Her title to broad recognition was indeed much older than her sudden fame on Broadway. In her first recital in 1928 she had presented "a lusty and touching number called '49 which was in a sense the root of all the more elaborate Western things that have developed since." As far back as 1938 she had presented in England a program of "miniature ballets." There was a first American Suite, consisting of The Harvesting, Mountain White, Dust, Strip-Tease and Rodeo and a second one, which she presented in this country, too, including The Harvesting, Blues, Forty-Niner and Rodeo, set to music by Gershwin, Vaughn Williams and arrangements of cowboy songs. In essential grasp and comprehension, the American Suites are the actual beginning of those full-blooded, genuine, virile and tender, irreverent and human, warm and witty Western genre pieces with which the choreographer's name is associated. Here, it seems, originated those wonderful horsemen on imaginary mounts akin to Billy the Kid which later reappear in de Mille's full sion of Rodeo and again in Oklahoma!

The mature and authoritative dance compositions for Oklahoma!

homa! were unquestionably the work of an accomplished artist who intelligently availed herself of the chance to use her experience in a new medium and to realize her creative visions in a larger measure. For Broadway and the general public her talent and proficiency were a surprising revelation. But for those who had followed her career with a fair appreciation of the chance, it was apparent that the Oklahoma! ballets were not merely the result of a few weeks of intensive rehearsing but the consummation of long years of hard work. The success in both range and depth of influence transcended by far the immediate satisfaction of a well-merited personal triumph. Through Miss de Mille the ballet, or more generally, the dance as a legitimate art form, had finally reached and conquered Broadway. In proper historical perspective this achievement will probably assume even greater significance as the vital forces of the dance exert an increasingly powerful influence on the lyric theatre and the musical comedy.

Miss de Mille's work in the musical field was without precedent, though certainly not without following. While she shares with several others the merit of having created outstanding show choreography, she may claim the exclusive credit for the discovery of a new theatrical function of the ballet. It was not an accidental find by any means. All her work is clearly of the theatre in the precise sense that the dramatic expression above all determines characterization, composition, choreography and movement pattern. Nothing could illustrate better her realistic approach to show choreography than her readiness to sacrifice valid and valuable work for the sake of theatrical function. For instance, after the first performance of Carousel she found the main ballet too long "to interest an audience that was beginning to show signs of fag (10:50 P.M.)" She threw away exactly half the ballet. . . . Everything lyric and choreographic was discarded in favor of what was dramatic."

Miss de Mille's notes for the production of Carousel furnish more evidence to the same effect: "The chief difficulty in composing dances for musical shows is the transition from style to style, realistic acting into singing into dancing into realism again with a heightening of belief and no awareness of the range of medium. The work of the choreographer is like that of a surgeon grafting alien members together so that muscles can flex and life blood flow through the foreign section without loss of function. . . . The choreographer for shows serves a form that is not organic to the ballet but to the larger pattern. The ballet sometimes becomes a mere truncated remnant in order to serve this purpose best. This is not always satisfactory choreography. It is, however, good show business." These ing on the revolving stage is turned slowly out of sight—or as an alternate, she moves downstage, stands for a second by her dream objection—and then moves softly out.

(I prefer this method of accomplishing the transition, but for purposes of production the other may have more element of spectacle.)

Two of Laurie's young friends enter—very young friends, about fourteen. They have a bouquet of field flowers for her. They are shy. She has become strange to them because she is betrothed and special one of them bursts into tears with nerves.

(The dancing throughout is lyric, non-realistic and highly stylized. It is salted with detailed action that is colloquial, human, recognizable.)

By any happy chance the dancers are used as minor characters in the other scenes their main characteristics must be maintained in the ballet.)

Another young girl runs in, waves her sunbonnet and calls to the people who are following . . . to a very gay triumphal tune. Perhaps a full development of the Morning Song.

Aunt Ella and the young woman enter—they are carrying the wedding clothes and the gifts. Laurie is stripped to her shift—and then dressed in great starched petticoats, corset, camisole, something blue, something old—all the little ceremonies are observed. The women who are not actually dressing her keep up a lace-like patterning around, talking, busy (strict choreographic form) while the skirts are shaken out, tossed up and rushed to the bride. The actual dressers are intent, busy and efficient in the gentle ceremony.

Laurie is dressed in her new starched dress. The veil is borne in—suddenly (a cappella) the men are heard offstage as they come up the hill—

The bride stands waiting in her group of women. No one moves. The bridegroom and his men enter. They take off their hats—and move into formal positions across the front of the stage—backs to audience—the bride stands center down-stage waiting—the women form an alley to the back of the stage. Laurie appears on Aunt Ella's arm—then advances alone between the women. The groom steps forward and lifts the veil—he kisses her—she stands transfixed—the whole scene freezes with horror—Suddenly she doubles up and tries to run. It is not Curley but Judd whom she has married—No one moves—She runs between them in nightmare terror. Judd does not move either. He waits for her to realize that the unavoidable has happened—She faces him panting—the women sneak away and abandon her—she throws herself for help into the men's arms—they have no faces—they start to leave—

He has her by the wrist in the middle of the stage. She is dropping with dread. He takes out his postcards—(The postcards enter . . . They are the real thing . . . right off the Police Gazette).

They proceed to dance around the stage in a kind of Whores' Parade—This dance will involve all the best Music Hall steps—it will be dirty, lusty, dreary and funny—They dance with the cowboys who go through the proceedings in a kind of somnambulistic state and still faceless—The leading girl of the troupe pulls Laurie to her and pushes her around in the parade, ripping her dress off her shoulders in a business-like way. When the girls have had enough they depart like a company of gluttoned spiders, turning before they go over the crest of the bill for a last appalling salute to their partners. The men stand huddled together somewhat dazed—they leave—not altogether triumphantly.

Laurie kneels on the stage, dress torn, exposed, ashamed, exhausted. The sky darkens as with thunderstorm. A woman with skirts and sunbonnet blowing runs terrified across the background as though to escape a tornado. Judd rushes on Laurie—swings her over his head and runs.

(If it is possible to suggest a rape accomplished in midair in the heart of a hurricane, I want that here.)

The action is brutal, violent, melodramatic and reminiscent of all the old woodcuts of the villain doing the heroine in, including the drag across the ground by the hair of her head. That the movement will be also beautiful is my chief concern.

In the moment of extremis, Laurie throws back her hands and finds Curley standing beside her. She is not alone. He is with her as she needs him.

He pulls out his gun and shoots Judd. Judd is not killed. Curley shoots again and again. Judd continues to advance. They struggle and Judd strangles Curley to death.

Laurie crouches by Curley. Judd comes toward her—The stage is dark with a yellow thunder light—Judd comes on. She cringes by the body of her lover, trying to seek protection from his dead useless hands—Judd is still moving—

Quick dimout

The real Laurie is discovered not feeling her freshest.

The reception of the Oklahoma! ballets was enthusiastic. The public response, in terms of applause and box office, broke every record. While the producers realized immediately that the ballet was a fine, popular attraction, they totally missed the artistic significance of an admirable accomplishment. For Broadway it was mainly a new success formula. Quite accidentally Miss de Mille had launched a fashion, and thereafter every self-respecting musical producer made it a point of honor and of business to include ballet choreography of some sort in each show. Many, in fact the majority, of these so-called ballets were so inept as to make one regret the old times of neat and precise routines and straightforward, accurate production numbers. But on the whole the ballet boom on Broadway proved a sound and solid and constructive trend as evidenced in Finian's Rainbow (dances by Michael Kidd) and On the Town and High-Button Shoes (dances by Jerome Robbins).

At first glance it seems strange that such profound and far-reaching changes should have been accomplished with so comparatively simple and unassuming a dance work as Laurie Makes Up Her Mind. But the whole production of Oklahoma! was uniformly distinguished by the absence of star performers and showy features. It relied, instead, on human interest. And Miss de Mille's choreographic direction amounted to a resolute—ment in contemporary terms of the forgotten belief in organic concept of the theatre.

In the record of contemporary theatrical dancing the Laurie Makes Up Her Mind is the first fully successfulization of a ballet as an integral part and element of the action. A composition like Balanchine's Slaughter on Avenue was an outstanding dance composition in its own but it was only loosely connected with the tenuous story de Mille's dramatic ballet "is so integrated with the prod as a whole that it actually carries forward the plot," ob John Martin; and Rosamond Gilder wrote in Theatre "Miss de Mille's dances do not interrupt the action w arbitrary restatement of a lyric theme in terms of move but on the contrary they move the plot forward, enlarg scope, enriching it with their own special contribution." ever, Oklahoma! remains unique. No other musical show has reached such a perfect balance of all the contributir ments and none has achieved such flawless homogene should be understood that this valuation is relative; by se discriminating theatrical standards Oklahoma! is no mor does not pretend to be more than a handsome and pl work as musicals go. Less spectacular than Oklahoma! immediate consequences, but more important in its impli was Miss de Mille's assignment to stage the whole prod of Allegro. Unfortunately this work, which promised to exciting, progressive venture, turned out to be a rather thi artificially contrived sequence of conventional episodes, of them with enough human or dramatic substance to serious interest.

Aside from any aesthetic consideration, the gain fo ballet in its conquest of Broadway is very real. Artistic expands immensely the range of creative possibilitie imaginative choreographers and talented dancers. Econo cally it affords jobs, working conditions and salaries su young ballet artists had never dared to hope for. And standards of taste leave much to be desired, the standar dancing as such are remarkably high. The lament of the t ophiles is entirely unjustified. The legitimate ballet has nc to fear and much to learn from Broadway. It is true th ballet companies have occasionally lost some of their bri stars and many of their less-known starlets to the m stage. But the sweeping statement that these excursions the loftier fields into the more popular ones have corru their taste and impaired their style and technique is not As long as our few organized ballet companies are unat offer their choreographers and dancers security and fai aries they have no right to complain of ingratitude or competition; rather they should appreciate that Broadway supports and preserves actual or potential talent which would otherwise be lost. Nothing is more demoralizing than no work at all.

The long-range effects of the popularization of the ballet on public taste and on theatrical dance itself are impossible to predict. So far, very little harm has been done and, if the precedent of fusion of theatrical elements begun in Oklahoma! is carried on, much good may be accomplished, both in the commercial theatre and the legitimate ballet.

Chronology

- [1767 Dec. 7: Opening of the John Street Theatre, New York.
Dec. 14: Harlequin's Vagaries, New York, "By command of His Excellency, the Governor, for the entertainment of Ten Indian Warriors that arrived here last Friday from South Carolina."
- [1781 Theatrical companies forming—drama, pantomime, opera, ballet. Seasons sometimes lasted five or six performances.
- [1782 M. Roussel's dancing academy in Baltimore opened. "Attendance to assiduity may be relied upon and the greatest regard will be paid to decorum." Roussel danced in the Dennis Ryan Company which listed corps de ballet.
- [1785 John Durang's début in Philadelphia, Old South Street Theatre, in a Peasant Dance. Due to public and government opposition to theatricals, program billed as "lectures." Durang was the first American-born dancer to receive national recognition. He had continual success since he was a native in a period when hostility to English artists was still much in evidence.
- [1786 Sept. 25: Anti-theatre law passed in Philadelphia.
- [1787 Newspaper dispatch complains of "swarms of dancing masters" among other "undesirables" coming from Europe.
- [1789 March 2: Anti-theatre law repealed in Philadelphia.
- [1792 Jan. 25: Arrival of M. and Mme Placide in "Dancing Ballot" [sic] The Bird Catcher. John Durang was in the ensemble. Troupe arrived Feb. 2, performed next night in Charleston in "feats of activity," tight-rope, tumbling and "A Dancing Ballet, called The Two Philosophers: or the Merry Girl. In which Madame Placide will dance a Hornpipe." Company was soon a box office attraction and invited to Hallam's Playhouse in New York. Presented pantomimes, spectacles, and ballets "in the French taste," besides "feats of activity."
- [1794 Tammany: or the Indian Chief, a patriotic spectacle with scenery by Charles Ciceri and John Durang in a Indian Dance. One of the earliest operas written in America on an American theme. Controversial political and Myrtilla later introduced by Mr. Conway.

 Sept. 19: Lady of the Lake listing "a Scots Pas de Deux by Mr. and Mrs. Conway and a Characteristic Dance by the Corps de Ballet, under the direction of Mr. Conway." At the Chatham.

1826 Oct. 23: Opening of the New York Theatre Bowery, popularly known as the Bowery Theatre, with a company including Edwin Forrest, Mrs. Duff, Mr. and Mrs. Barrett and Charlotte Durang. The Bowery was destined to pioneer in the introduction of European dancers to this country. There was great rivalry between it and the Park Theatre.

1827 Feb. 7: Charles Gilfert, manager of the Bowery Theatre, brought to America the first of a long series of French dancers. Much excitement and rumor preceded the appearance of Mme Hutin in La Bergère Coquette, but her costume was too brief and "every lady in the lower tier of boxes immediately left the house." For following performance Mme Hutin wore Turkish trousers under her ballet dress, but gradually sentiment changed and dancers were permitted to wear the traditional costumes. From this time on, French dancing was the rage.

March 1: M. and Mme Achille "from the Opera House, Paris" at the Bowery. M. Achille was the best male dancer yet in America and Madame was "second only to Hutin." They alternated with Mme Hutin, and on March 10 performed the same night.

June 27: Début of Mlle Céleste at the Bowery. On June 29 she danced "the grand pas de deux from the Ballet of the Pages of the Duke of Vendôme.

July 7: Début of Mlle Héloïse in a gavotte from Armide.

July 23: Merchant of Venice with Edwin Forrest and Mrs. Duff, followed by a pas de deux by Céleste and Héloïse. Thereafter, M. and Mme Achille, Mlle Céleste, Mme Hutin and Mlle Héloïse danced singly and in combination.

Sept. 3: The Caliph of Bagdad, produced by Labasse, to selected music of Rossini, with M. and Mme Achille, M. Durang, Céleste, Héloïse and Mme Hutin, at the Bowery. Earliest dated American ballet print; earliest datable ballet lithograph a few months later.

1828 June 14: Début of Mlle Rosalie at Park Thea

Mme Hutin (-Labasse), the Achilles, Céleste, Constance, and M. Barbière.

July 1: Début of Mlle Louise.

Aug. 30: Début of M. Charles and Mme Ronzi Vestris "from the Theatre San Carlo, Naples, and the Operas Paris and London," at the Bowery. M. and Mme Vestris were the best yet to be seen in America. Solos and duets without corps, pas de deux a sensation.

29-30 The Park Theatre was the only one open; the Bowery was closed for most of the season, the Lafayette burned, the Chatham was disorganized. Artists went to Philadelphia where there were, at this time, three theatres. Achille and Whale and Mr. Conway set up schools of the dance.

329 Oct. 3: Farewell performance of M. and Mme Vestris. M. and Mme Achille with Mme Ronzi Vestris in Annette and Lubin at Park.

330 Début of Paul Hazard, teacher of Lee and Maywood and George Washington Smith, at Arch Street Theatre Philadelphia.

332 Début of Ravel family (ten members) at the Park rope dancers, aerobats and pantomime ballet.

334 Nov. 17: Return to America of Céleste, in drama The French Spy and a "grand pantomime ballet" from La Bayadère at the Bowery.

335 Jan. 3: The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish, pantomime with pas seul from Robert le Diable by Céleste.

April 15: First American performance of La Sylphide by Céleste.

336 Master and Miss Well (Henri and Harriet), dance interludes at the Park as infants.

Sept.: Début of Mlle Augusta, at the Park, The Naiades.

Oct. 3: Introduction of The Maid of Cashmere, ou l'Amour et la Bayadère by Céleste, at the National Theatre, with Miss Watson, Morley, Mrs. Conduit as Zama, Plumer as the Unknown, Mlle Arraline, and "M. and Mme Cheekeni of the Kings Theatre, London. Played every night successively through Oct. 25. Scenery was by Bengough.

Nov. 30: Mlle Augusta's production of La Bayadère at the Park. Dances arranged by Augusta, an operatic ballet spectacle, given many times during season, very popular. Mlle Augusta threatened Céleste's supreme position and rivalry stimulated attendance at both theatres. Critics considered Augusta the better dancer.

- First performance of Masaniello, or the Dumb Girl of Portici, Philadelphia, Céleste as Fenella.
- 1837 March 25: New York Mirror comments in Augusta's favor on rival Bayadères with Céleste and Mlle Augusta simultaneously at National and Park Theatres.
- Nov. 23: Début of Mlle Lecomte as Helena in a selection from Robert le Diable at the Park. Rivalry with Mlle Augusta (now at National) in La Bayadère on Nov. 28.
- Dec. 30: The Maid of Cashmere (Le Dieu et la Bayadère) at the Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia. Débuts of Mary Ann Lee (14) as Fatima and Augusta Maywood—La Petite Augusta—(13) as Zelica. Lee and Maywood were the first American dancers to achieve national and international fame respectively in the classical ballet.
- Mlle Céleste in Philadelphia.
- 1838 March 17: La Sylphide, with Maywood in title role and Lee as Flora, Philadelphia.
- April 19: The Dew Drop, or La Sylphide with La Petite Augusta (Maywood) in her New York début—a sensation.
- Lee with Lecomte in The Maid of Cashmere, Philadelphia.
- Mlle Augusta in The Maid of Cashmere, Philadelphia. Début of George Washington Smith, Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia. Smith danced with almost every ballerina of any importance who came to this country and, in a time of indifference to male dancers, got equal billing on programs and wide acclaim.
- Augusta Maywood goes to Europe to Paris Opera, first American to be admitted. Never returned to this country.
- 1839 Début of M. and Mme Taglioni (brother and sister-in-law to the famous Marie Taglioni of the Paris Opera) in La Sylphide at the Park. These were the most finished dancers yet to be seen in America; they found the lack of trained supporting corps a great disadvantage.
- June: The Taglionis at Chestnut Street Theatre in Philadelphia.
- June 12: Mary Ann Lee's New York début in "a piece from La Bayadère" at the Bowery.
- June 27: Mary Ann Lee and Julia Turnbull in The Sisters, billed at the Bowery with John Gilbert in Dick Turpin, the Highwayman, an equestrian drama.

Aug. and Sept.: The Taglionis at the Park, Sept. 12 in Nathalaie, or la Laitière Suisse with the opera Fidelio. Farewell performance Sept. 24.

Oct. 2: Departure of Taglionis.

Oct. and Nov.: Jean and Marius Petipa arrived with Lecomte on her return from Europe. Oct. 29: La Tarantule; Nov. 4: Jocko, the Brazilian Ape at National. Lost money, went with Lecomte and company to the Bowery Theatre, again met financial failure and returned to France in November.

Nov. 11: Augusta Maywood's début at the Paris Opera. Master and Miss Wells danced at the New Chatham Theatre, New York.

1839 Dec. 16: Return of Céleste to New York stage. Now considered less of a dancer than an "exceedingly graceful representative of dumb boys and dumb girls in melodrama."

1840 May 14: Début of Fanny Elssler at the Park Theatre in New York in La Cracoviennne and La Tarantule. This was one of the very greatest sensations in the history of the American stage. Elssler's dancing was the rage for two years. Paid $500 a performance, she netted approximately $100,000. James Sylvain, her partner, was not received well and left the country in 1841. Billed for La Tarantule were: Lauretta-Elssler; Luigi-Sylvain; Clorinda-Miss Kerr; Mathea-Mme Arraline; Dr. Omeopatha-Mr. Fisher.

May 14: Céleste danced La Cachucha at the Chatham the same night as Fanny Elssler's début.

June: Lee danced La Cachucha at Vauxhall the same night that Fanny Elssler danced it at the Park.

June 8: Fanny Elssler in La Sylphide and a new Spanish dance, El Jaleo de Jeres. Mme Lecomte at Chatham danced La Sylphide "just as if Fanny Elssler had not been here."

June 11: Elssler left New York. Some dramas and La Petite Céleste in La Bayadère and La Cachucha to an indifferent public.

Aug. 12: Fanny Elssler returned to New York in La Sylphide and La Cachucha. "The mere mortals of the company were exhibited in The Married Rake."

Aug. 20: Elssler in Nathalie with Sylvain and Julia Turnbull.

1841 Fanny Elssler's tour south and to Havana with James Sylvain, the Vallee sisters, and Mlle Desjardins. To New York Dec. 8.

- 1842 Jan. to May: Elssler's second tour to Havana, with M. and Mme Jules Martin, and George Washington Smith. June 8: Fanny Elssler at Park Theatre in La Somnambule with M. and Mme Martin, and Mlle Desjardins. July 1: Elssler's last performance in America, in a benefit for the Theatrical Fund: La Fille mal Gardée, La Gipsy, The Fairy and the Prince. July 16: Elssler sailed back to Europe. Sept.: M. and Mme Lecomte, Mary Ann Lee, and Mrs. Goad at Chatham Theatre in La Bayère. Dec. 13: Mazulme, Walnut Theatre, Philadelphia. Produced by Ravels, it ran twenty-three nights. G. W. Smith danced.
- 1843 March: Julia Turnbull at the Park Theatre, New York, in La Cracovienne. Sept.: First American performances of Robert le Diable in New York, Lee supporting Lecomte. Sept. 15: Auber's Muette de Portici at the Bowery, New York, with Lee as Julietta. Dec.: M. and Mme Checkini at Barnum's, Harlequin Santa Claus, with some "Snow White Negroes from Brazil."
- 1844 Jan.: The Three Lovers "performed by twenty-five children under six years of age—the most amusing novelty ever seen." July 8: The Revolt of the Harem: Mr. Wells—Mohamet, King of Granada; M. Martin—Ishmael; Herr Korponay—Myssouf, Chief of the Eunuchs; Master Wood—Zeir, the King's Page; Mlle Pauline Desjardins—Zulma; Miss Vallee—Mina; Miss H. Vallee—Lolah; Mary Taylor—Zorah. Scenery, "very splendid," by Bengough and Duke White. July 24: La Somnambule (Act I) with MM. Korponay, Martin, Wells, Joseph, and Mlle Desjardins, Miss Taylor, Mrs. Hardwick, and Miss Vallee. Nov.: Mary Ann Lee to Paris, School of the Paris Opera, to study under Jean Coralli.
- 1845 Nov. 24: Mary Ann Lee's second début, Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia, La Jolie Fille de Gand, G. W. Smith in cast. Repertory of things learned in Paris. April 6: La Fille du Danube, presented by Mary Ann Lee as Fleurs des Champs at the Park Theatre, New York, with George Washington Smith as Rudolph.
- 1846 Jan. 1: First American production of Giselle, by Mary Ann Lee, with G. W. Smith as Albrecht, at the Howard Atheneum in Boston.

Feb. 2: Début of Mme Augusta in her production of Giselle at the Park Theatre, New York.

July 7: Début of Mlle Blangy at Niblo's Garden, danced and mimed in The Vengeance of Diana as Calisto. Placide and the Ravels also at Niblo's.

July 20: Mlle Blangy in La Sylphide; Sept. in Giselle.

July and Aug.: The Lehman Troupe (five sisters and Schmidt Lehman), and the Ravels in a "farewell performance" at Palmo's Opera House.

Sept.: Barnum's American Museum presented the "Shaking Quakers, three beautiful ladies, and three gentlemen from the society . . . at Canterbury, N. H.," who will "sing, dance, whirl and shake in a unique quaker costume." In October these were billed with two "ourang-outangs," two monstrous snakes, and an "Anatomical Venus."

Nov.: Mme Augusta, Mlle Blangy, M. Hazard, M. Bouxary, M. Frederic and Mlle Dumier at Palmo's Opera House.

Dec. 7: Début of Les Viennoises, 48 children drilled by Mme Josephine Weiss. Opening night: "Pas de Fleurs" (with 42), "Pas Oriental" (with all), and "Pas Hongrois" (with 24). An enormous success.

1847 Jan. 23: Début of Signora Ciocca and her partner, Morra, Philadelphia, in Diana and Endymion. Feb. 1 in New York.

Feb. 16: Mme Augusta returned to New York in Giselle; 18th, Nathalie; 19th, Urielle, ou le Diable Amonreux.

March: Viennese children at the Park Theatre, the 1st through 20th, regular players "relegated to farce and afterpiece." Ciocca and Morra at New York Opera House (former Greenwich Theatre) which had opened on Feb. 8.

The Naiad Queen, Bowery Theatre, New York, Julia Turnbull's first success.

May: Mlle Blangy at the Park.

June 18: Lee's farewell performance (Smith also dancing) in "Pas Espagnol." (Lee, although she had retired because of ill health, danced a few times after this.)

Autumn: Smith at Bowery Theatre as premier danseur and ballet master, supervised Turnbull productions.

Oct. 21: Monplaisir troupe at the Broadway Theatre in a "grand asiatic ballet in two acts and five tableaux," L'Aimée, or an Oriental Vision, with Céleste. During 1847 and 1848 this troupe toured America.

Dec.: Turnbull and Smith at the Bowery, The Naiad Queen, Giselle, Nathalie.

1848 April: Smith and Turnbull again at Bowery.

Sept.: Reopening of the Park Theatre, "The entire interior was a marvel of richness, elegance and beauty."

Adele and Hippolyte Monplaisir, Giovanna Cioeca, Gaetano Neri, George Washington Smith, Miss St. Clair, etc., participating.

Aug.: Bowery Theatre, New York, engagement of Signora Cioeca, rivalry with Julia Turnbull, Smith refuses to dance a Polka with Turnbull, riot. Smith's first major original work, The Magic Flute, first performance here. Augusta Maywood engaged for Domenico Ronzani's famous Carnival at La Scala—tremendous reception, career afterward devoted to Italian theatre.

New York Directory lists eight dancing masters, eleven teachers of piano, two of singing, three of painting and drawing.

0 Début of Leon Espinosa with Ravel troupe. Captured by Indians while on tour.

Dec. 16: Ballet troupe at Broadway Theatre with Célestine and Victorine Franck, "from the Grand Opera, Paris," Mr. Leon Espinosa, "from the Porte St. Martin," Mlle Espinosa, M. Gredelue, Adeline and Signor Neri. Le Diable à Quatre.

1 Début of Lola Montez, New York, choreography by Smith. Montez a failure, applause for Smith and corps.

Feb. 3: Début of five Roussets in Catarina, ou la Reine des Bandits. Caroline Rousset (best of five) in title role, Adelaide Rousset in male roles en travestie, Theresine, Clementine and Jean.

5 Nov.: Eight male and eight female dancers from Madrid, directed by José Maria Lorente.

5 Leon Espinosa and Mme Monplaisir in Esmeralda, New York.

7 Sept. 15: Début of Domenico Ronzani troupe for opening of Philadelphia Academy of Music, with Cesare, Pia, Enrico Cecchetti (7 years old), six Pratesis, primo Filippo Baratti, prima Louise Lamoureux (American), in Perrot's version of Faust. Mechanical difficulties, troupe never successful.

Sept.: Beginning of financial panic in country, banks closing in New York and Boston, waning popularity of ballet.

salable commodity." It was produced in New York in 1869, 1871, 1873, 1879, 1881, 1884, 1889, 1903, was on the road almost continuously until 1909 and was followed by burlesque and imitations.

1867 May 27: The Black Crook much refurbished. Some new sets by Richard Marston, "formerly of the Drury Lane Theatre," a new ballroom scene, "the most elaborate and beautiful ever presented to an American audience," some new dancers and two new ballets: The Bouquet and The Water Lily.

June: The Zuccoli sisters, "late of The Black Crook" at Butler's American Theatre in The Sylph, Les Aimées. Joined in August by the Zanfretta troupe.

Sept.: Some new ballets, new costumes, a new illuminated ballroom, a grand carnival and masquerade for The Black Crook.

Oct.: Rita Sangalli and the Rigl sisters have left The Black Crook. 150 children were introduced in La Garde Impériale, "cavalry, chasseurs, sapeurs, zouaves, drum corps, etc., going through military tactics and evolutions."

Oct. 3: The Devil's Auction, rival of the Crook, at Bauvard's Opera House and Museum (Broadway at 30th Street), with the De Pol troupe in their American début, Mlle Guiseppina Morlacchi (Oct. 23), Elisa Blasina, Mlle Diani, Augusta Sohlke.

Dec.: De Pol troupe to Academy of Music, Mlle Morlacchi the favorite. The Magic Fairy Mountain, and a revival of La Bayadère.

8 Jan. 4: 475th and last performance of The Black Crook at Niblo's.

Jan. 17: Opening of The White Fawn at Niblo's, not as successful as its forerunner.

Jan. 20-25: The Water Spirit, spectacularly staged, with Annetta Galletti, Viro Ferrand, Laura Vincent, Julia Melville and a full corps de ballet in Brooklyn.

March 10: Humpty Dumpty opened at the Olympic Theatre, with Rita Sangalli and Betty Rigl. Joined later by Mlle Leah from Niblo's and in April by La Petite Ravel. This spectacle ran 483 performances.

July 11: Howard Glover, musical director for The White Fawn, took a benefit; the ballet danced Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, including a scene by a rivulet by Mlle Sohlke and M. Van Humme.

Oct. 5: The Crimson Shield, or the Nymphs of the Rainbow opened at the Bowery. "This piece is little else

- Aug. 18-Dec. 6: Imre Kiralfy mounted dances for a revival of The Black Crook.
- 1875 Aug. 28: Kiralfy brothers' production of Jules Verne's Around the World in 80 Days at the Academy of Music, Manhattan. This ran to mid-October and was often revived—in 1878 with Marie Bonfanti.
- Oct. 17: Parisian Varieties at 16th Street and Broadway advertised in the N. Y. Herald as "Guilt-Edged Pleasures, a satire on Free Love . . . voluptuous without coarseness, fascinating but fastidious, spicy without vulgarity, gorgeous ballets, naughty but so nice, funny but artistic, Parisian but proper, piquant but moral, charming but not loud." "Such advertising with resultant performances in the hall kept the Parisian Varieties afloat when decent shows were forced by lack of patronage to shut down."
- 1876 Aug. 4: A production at Booth's Playhouse of Byron's tragedy, Sardanapalus, with much ballet and spectacle, on which the N. Y. Herald of Aug. 15 sarcastically commented: "The play was hacked to pieces. . . . What we had from beginning to end was spectacle and ballet. . . . There was one fine tragic burst when standing on his toes he [Signor Mascagno] pirouetted across the stage and jumped at least four feet into the air, which drew forth thunders of applause from the admirers of Byron's immortal genius. . . ."
- Sept. 18: At Niblo's Garden Ali Baba, a spectacular extravaganza, with Mlle Elizabetha and Helene Menzeli and a corps of fifty led by M. Blandowski. Scenes were: the Grotto of Emeralds, the Magic Ship, a Crumbling Palace, a Field of Mushrooms, etc. This ran uninterrupted until Dec. 9.
- Dec. 25: Niblo's Garden reopened with the Kiralfy brothers as sole managers, with a new spectacle, Azurine and on Jan. 22, a revival of Around the World in 80 Days.
- 1877 March 14: At Booth's Theatre, the Kiralfy brothers staged Jules Verne's A Trip to the Moon, with a chorus of 100. Offenbach's music and a ballet with Mlle de Rosa, Palladino, Mauri, Mascarina and Marie Gaugain. "This thing closed the house in ten days."
- 1878 Oct. 21: The Deluge, staged at Niblo's by the Kiralfy brothers, with Mlle de Rosa.
- 1879 Sept. 24: Enchantment, a new Kiralfy brothers' spectacle, opened at Niblo's.
- 1880 Influence of Froebel's theories of creative play on teaching movement to children. Increasing "respectability" of the dance beginning in the schools.

- 1881 George Washington Smith opened a studio for the dance in Philadelphia.

March 26: With the play One o'Clock, or the Knight and the Wood Demon at Aberle's Theatre on 8th Street, Novissimo and Florence Barrett danced Slave and Wood Nymphs, and an item entitled North American Indians.

Sept. 3: The Kiralfy brothers' version of Michael Strogoff. Other versions at the Booth, Aberle's and Niblo's. Much heralded but not successful. The N. Y. Herald of Sept. 4 commented: "The piece moved along so slowly at times as to be intolerably tedious, but the dresses, the scenery and the ballets . . . were . . . rich and beautiful." Closed mid-September. Later revived.

- 1883 Aug. 21: The Kiralfys' spectacle Excelsior at Niblo's, produced by Luigi Menzotti at the announced cost of $75,000, with "gorgeous scenery and dancing." It ran until December 15, glorifying the triumph of electric light over darkness.

- 1884 Aug. 18: At the Star Theatre, the Kiralfy's production of Sieba and the Seven Ravens. A production of the same by Heinrich Conreid was running simultaneously at Niblo's. The Kiralfy version closed first, on October 18, and the one at Niblo's on November 8. "A combination of drama, pantomime, opera and ballet."

- 1885 Dodsworth's Dancing published in New York.

- 1887 Jan. 9: Imre Kiralfy's production of Jerome Ravel's Mazulm, or the Night Owl, with Clara Qualitz and Arnold Kiralfy dancing. Ran to March 10.

Aug. 17: At Niblo's, Lagardère (founded on the melodrama The Duke's Motto), staged by the Kiralfy brothers, with Maurice Barrymore and dancers Clara Qualitz and Arnold Kiralfy.

Dec. 5: Mlle Bonfanti still dancing—in Arabian Nights, or Aladdin's Wonderful Lamp—with the Imperial Burlesque Company.

- 1888 June 25: The Kiralfys' spectacle Nero, or the Fall of Rome in Staten Island. 2,300 persons were asserted to have been in the cast. Scenes were: Interior of the Palace (300 feet long by 80 feet deep), the Coliseum and, finally, the Burning of Rome.

Aug. 18: Bolossy Kiralfy's production of Mathias Sandorf, "one of those spectacular nerve-thrillers that

- either Kiralfy could stage so well. As might be expected, the ballet took precedence of dramatic values." This ran through October 13 at Niblo's.
- 1889 Aug. 17: Bolossy Kiralfy's spectacular ballet extravaganza Antiope, with Mlle Paris and Carmencita. (At first the latter won no exceptional response but later was a sensation.)
- 1890 Opening of Madison Square Gardens with Leon Espinosa as ballet master. Ballets were Peace and War and Choosing the National Flower; both later deleted.
- 1893 Opening of Mme Menzeli's Knickerbocker Conservatory for dance in New York.
- 1896 New York Directory lists sixty-three teachers of dancing, eighteen of elocution, seven of fencing, fifteen of the zither and nine of painting and drawing.
- 1899 Death of George Washington Smith.
- 1908 Jan. 20: First American visit of Adeline Genée in Ziegfeld production The Soul Kiss at The New York Theatre.
- 1909 Opening of ballet school at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. First director and teacher, Mme Malvina Cavalazzi.
- 1910 Spring season of Anna Pavlova and Mikhail Mordkin at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Their first appearance in America.
- 1910 Victorina Galamberti, from the Manhattan Opera House and Giovanni Molassi, present program of "Dances Classiques Russes," announcing "for the first time on any English-speaking continent."
- 1910-1911 The Imperial Russian Ballet and Orchestra, Theodore Stier, Conductor, "Supporting the Incomparable Mlle Anna Pavlova, Prima Ballerina Assoluta" Imperial Opera House, St. Petersburg, and M. Mi
Premier Danseur Classique, Imperial Moscow." Season in New York and to
- 1911 La Saison Russe, Gertrude Hoffmann C Winter Garden in New York. Director rapher: Theodore Kosloff. Repertory: Cleopatra, Scheherazade, restaged with Fokine and Bakst. Company included Ly Maria Baldina, Theodore and Alexis Bulgakov, Alexandre Volinine.
Adeline Genée, Alexandre Volinine at the Metropolitan Opera House, present "an authentic record by Mlle Genée of

- Dancers between the years 1710 and 1845," in two parts.
- 1912 Mikhail Mordkin, Bronislava Pajitzkaya, Lydia Lopokova in Ballet Divertissements, choreographed by Mordkin, sandwiched between the musicals, Vera Violetta and Undine, with Annette Kellermann at the Winter Garden.
- 1912-1913 All-star Imperial Russian Ballet, Mikhail Mordkin, Choreographic Director. Company included: Ekaterina Geltzer, Julia Sedowa, Lydia Lopokova, Alexandre Volinine, Bronislava Pajitzkaya. Program of Divertissements and "ocular operas."
- 1913 Gertrude Hoffmann, Mme Polaire, Lady Constance Steward-Richardson, "First International Tour."
- 1915-1916 Serge de Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, first American tour, under the auspices of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Fokine, Nijinsky, Karsavina are absent.
- 1916 Anna Pavlova, with Alexandre Volinine and Company, in Charles Dillingham's Hippodrome, "The National Amusement Institution of America," presented in a program with "The Big Show, The Mammoth Minstrels and the Ice Ballet, The Merry Doll."
- 1916-1917 Serge de Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, second American tour, under the auspices of the Metropolitan Opera Company. First performance of Nijinsky's Til Eulenspiegel.
- 1917 Adolph Bolm organizes the Ballet Intime, with twelve dancers, including Roshanara, Ratan Devi and Michio Ito.
- 1918 Le Coq d'Or at the Metropolitan Opera House, choreography by Adolph Bolm, with Rosina Galli.
- 1919 Michel Fokine opens ballet school in New York. Petrouchka at the Metropolitan Opera House, choreography by Adolph Bolm with Rosina Galli.
- 1919 Nov. 24: Michel Fokine stages the dances for Aphrodite, a Morris Gest Musical at the New York Century Theatre.
- 1920 First performance of Skyscrapers, "a ballet of modern American life in six scenes," music by John Alden Carpenter, décor and costumes by Robert Edmond Jones, Chicago Opera Company.
- 1920-1921 The Pavley-Ukrainisky Ballet, "first American ballet and official ballet of Chicago Civic Opera," directed by Andreas Pavley and Serge Oukraïnsky.
- 1921 Sept. 3: Michel Fokine stages Thunderbird podrome revue Get Together, Fokine himself and Vera Fokina in principal roles.

- 1922 New York, Krazy Kat, A Jazz-Pantomime, music by John Alden Carpenter, settings and costumes by George Herriman, choreography by Adolph Bolm, based on Herriman's cartoons, with George Barrère's Little Symphony.
- 1922 Oct. 15: First performance of the Fokine Ballet composed of advanced students.
- 1923 Michel Fokine composes two ballets for the Ziegfeld Follies, Frollicking Gods and Farljandio.
- 1924 Michel Fokine organizes the American Ballet with Vera Fokina and students from his school. First performance at the Metropolitan Opera House, February 26.
- 1924-1925 Last American tour of Anna Pavlova Company.
- 1924-1927—Organization of the Chicago Allied Arts, the first "ballet theatre" in the United States, directed by Adolph Bolm, Eric DeLamarter, Nicholas Remisoff, with John Alden Carpenter and Frederick Stock. Adolph Bolm, ballet master, Ruth Page, première danseuse. Tamar Karsavina as guest.
- 1925-1926 Mikhail Mordkin and his Russian Ballet Company, included Vera Nemtchinova, Hilda Butsova, Pierre Vladimiroff and corps de ballet. Repertory included, Carnival, Azyade, The Bow and Arrow Dance, Italian Beggar Dance, Trepak.
- 1926-1927 Mikhail Mordkin and his Russian Ballet Company, included Xenia Makletzova, Vera Nemtchinova, Hilda Butsova, Pierre Vladimiroff. Swan Lake added to repertory.
- 1928 Leonide Massine starts a three-year contract with the Roxy Theatre in New York, as choreographer and premier danseur. Four performances daily, weekly change of program. Patricia Bowman prima ballerina for two years.
- 1929 Anton Dolin dances in Lew Leslie's International Revue with Gertrude Lawrence and Argentinita.
- 1930 Le Sacre du Printemps, staged by Leonide Massine for the League of Composers, with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski as conductor, Martha Graham in principal role, The Chosen One. April 11, 12, 14 in Philadelphia, April 22, 23 at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.
- 1931 Jan. 23: Death of Anna Pavlova (born 1882).
Feb. 27: Leonide Massine, Concert début at the Arts Club in Chicago.

- 1933 Dec. 21: First American performance of the Ballet Russes de Monte Carlo at the St. James Theatre in New York.
- 1933-1934 Jooss Ballet, first American season. Repertory: Impressions of a Big City, Pavane on the Death of an Infanta, A Ball in Old Vienna, The Green Table, The Seven Heroes.
- 1934 Jan. 2: Opening of the School of American Ballet.
- 1934 Dec. 6, 7, 8: The Producing Company of the School of American Ballet presents Balanchine's Mozartiana, Serenade, Alma Mater, Transcendence at the Avery Memorial Theatre in Hartford, Conn.
- 1934-1937 Ruth Page appointed Ballet Director and première danseuse of the revived Chicago Grand Opera Company.
- 1935 Mar. 1-15: First New York season of the American Ballet at the Adelphi Theatre in New York.
Nov.: The American Ballet Company is engaged as ballet company for the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.
- 1936 The Hollywood Ballet, organized by Marcel Silver and Aida Barona, on tour in 1936.
May-July: Organization of The Ballet Caravan.
Organization of Catherine Littlefield's Philadelphia Ballet Company.
- 1937 Apr.: The Mordkin Ballet opens at the Majestic Theatre in New York, with Giselle and The Goldfish.
Apr.: Stravinsky Festival at the Metropolitan Opera House, with Jeu de Cartes, Apollon Musagète, Le Baiser de la Fée.
William Christensen appointed ballet master of the San Francisco Opera Company, former members of his company included.
Catherine Littlefield's Ballet appears at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées in Paris.
- 1937-1938 Dance International 1900-1937 in New York including performances by the Philadelphia Ballet Patricia Bowman, Paul Haakon.
- 1938 Split between de Basil and Massine. Incorporation of Universal Art. Massine appointed Director of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo.
Organization of the (Ruth) Page-(Bentley) Stone Ballet Company in Chicago with more than thirty dancers.
Sept. 17: Theodore Kosloff Ballet at the Hollywood Bowl. Program: Scheherazade, Spectre de la Rose, Chopin Memories, Shingandi.

- 1938-1939 Second and last season of the Mordkin Ballet.
- 1939 Jan.: Ballet Carnival, organized by dancers from the motion-picture studios, backed by Franz Tuttle and David Robel with Nana Gollner as prima ballerina. Appeared for tentative season at the Wilshire-Ebell Theatre in Los Angeles.
- 1940 Jan. 11: Opening of Ballet Theatre at the Center Theatre in Rockefeller Center, New York City. Michel Fokine, choreographer with Ballet Theatre, revives Les Sylphides.
- 1940-1941 Last (sixth) American tour of de Basil's Original Ballet Russe before the war.
- 1942 Sergei J. Denham becomes Director of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Leonide Massine works as choreographer for Ballet Theatre. Aug. 22: Death of Michel Fokine in New York (born April 26, 1880). Oct. 16: First performance of Agnes de Millé's Rodeo, by the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Organization of The Dance Players, Eugene Loring as director and choreographer.
- 1943 Mar. 31: Première of Oklahoma, Theatre Guild Musical, by Oscar Hammerstein II and Richard Rodgers with choreography by Agnes de Mille. The American Concert Ballet, organized by William Dollar, Todd Bolender, Lilian Lanesc, Mary Jane Shea.
- 1944 July 15: Death of Mikhail Mordkin (born 1881, in Moscow. (Vincent Youman's Ballet Revue, with ballets by Leonide Massine and Eugene van Grona. The company did not reach New York. Jan. 3: First American tour of Mia Slavenska Company. Company included David Tihmar, Norma Vasilavina, Audrey Keane, Joseph A. Harris. Oct. 30: Opening of the Ballet International at the International Theatre in New York.
- 1944-1945 The Foxhole Ballet, formed to tour in Europe for U.S.O., toured the United States 1945-1947.
- 1945 Lucia Chase and Oliver Smith appointed co-directors of Ballet Theatre. Ballet Russe Highlights, organized by Leonide Massine, with Irina Baronova, André Eglevsky, Yurek Lazowsky, Anna Istomina, Kathryn Lee.
- 1945-1946 Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin Company, including Ana Ricarda, Rex Cooper, Albia Kavan, Jack Gansert.

- 1946 Ballet Russe Highlights, organized by Leonide Massine. Company included Igor Youskevitch, Rosella Hightower, Yurek Lazowsky, Anna Istomina, Bettina Rosay, Jean Guelis.

Ballet for America, with Nana Gollner, Yurek Shabalevski, Kathryn Lee, Yurek Lazowsky, Tatiana Grantzeva, Paul Petroff, Bettina Rosay.

Nov. 20: First performance of Ballet Society at Central High School of Needle Trades, New York.

- 1947-1948 Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin Company, including Bettina Rosay, Oleg Tupine, Roszika Sabo.

- 1948 Alicia Markova, Anton Dolin and Mia Slavenska join the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo as guest artists for the fall season at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Ballet Theatre suspends activity for the 1948-1949 season. Alicia Alonso organizes the "Ballet Alicia Alonso" in Havana, Cuba, with former members of Ballet Theatre, including Igor Youskevitch, Barbara Fallis, Cynthia Riseley, Melissa Hayden and Pauline Lloyd. Fernando Alonso is general director, Alberto Alonso artistic director, Max Gobermann musical director.

Ballet Society established as New York City Ballet Company, presenting two nights of ballet weekly, also furnishing the incidental dances for New York City Opera Company at City Center.

CHICAGO OPERA BALLET

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DICOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 EL AMOR BRUJO		Manuel de Falla	Adolph Bolm	Rollo Peters	Rollo Peters	Chicago, Ill., 1925
2 BAL DE MARIONNETTES		Erik Satie	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1925
3 CHRISTMAS CAROL		Vaughn Williams	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1925
4 ELOPEMENT		Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1924
5 LA FARCE DU PONT NEUF	Adolph Bolm	Jeanne Clement Herscher	Adolph Bolm	Jean Valmier	Jean Valmier	Chicago, Ill., 1926
6 LE FOYER DE LA DANSE	Adolph Bolm	Emmanuel Chabrier	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1924
7 LITTLE CIRCUS		Jacques Offenbach	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1925
8 MANDRAGORA		Karol Szymanowsky	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1925
9 PARNASSUS AU MONTMARTRE		Erik Satie	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1926
10 PIERROT LUNAIRE	A. Giraud	Arnold Schoenberg	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1926
11 THE RIVALS	Chinese legend	Henry Eichheim	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1925
12 TRAGEDY OF THE		Alexandre	Adolph Bolm	Nicolai Remisoff	Nicolai Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1927

CATHERINE LITTLEFIELD BALLET

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 AUDACE		Francis Poulenc	Alexis Dolinoff	R. Deshays	J. Pascal	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
2 BARN DANCE	Catherine Littlefield	Folk Tunes	Catherine Littlefield	Angelo Pinto	Salvatore Pinto	Philadelphia, Pa., 1937
3 BOLERO		Maurice Ravel	Catherine Littlefield	Lee Gainsborough	Lee Gainsborough	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
4 CAFE SOCIETY	Catherine Littlefield	Ferde Grofe	Catherine Littlefield	Carl Shaffer	Carl Shaffer	Chicago, Ill., 1938
5 CLASSICAL SUITE		Johann Sebastian Bach	Catherine Littlefield	R. Deshays	P. T. Champs	Princeton, N. J., 1937
6 DAPHNIS AND CHLOE	Catherine Littlefield	Maurice Rayel	Catherine Littlefield	A. Jarin	J. Pascal	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
7 THE FAIRY DOLL		Josef Bayer	Catherine Littlefield	A. Jarin	P. T. Champs	Philadelphia, Pa., 1935
8 FANTASIA		Johann Strauss	Jack Pottleiger	Mary Fales	Mary Fales	Chicago, Ill., 1938
9 FÊTE CHAMPÊTRE		Lully, Grétry, Rameau	C. Littlefield, Edward Caton	A. Jarin	J. Pascal	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
10 HOME LIFE OF THE GODS	Catherine Littlefield	Erik Satie	Catherine Littlefield	Lazar Galpern	Lazar Galpern	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
11 H. P.	Catherine Littlefield	Carlos Chavez	Catherine Littlefield	Diego Rivera	Diego Rivera	Philadelphia, Pa., 1932

12	LADIES' BETTER DRESSES	Catherine Littlefield	Herbert Kingsley	Catherine Littlefield	R. Starke	Joy Michael	Chicago, Ill., 1938
13	LET THE RIGHT- EYES BE GLAD	Catherine Littlefield	J. Donath	Catherine Littlefield	Angelo Pinto	Salvatore Pinto	Philadelphia, Pa., 1937
14	THE MINSTREL	Catherine Littlefield	Claude Debussy	Catherine Littlefield	Angelo Pinto	Salvatore Pinto	Haverford, Pa., 1935
15	MOMENT ROMANTIQUE		Frederic Chopin	Catherine Littlefield			Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
16	PARABLE IN BLUE	Catherine Littlefield	Martin Gabowitz	Catherine Littlefield	George C. Jenkins	Lee Gainsborough	Philadelphia, Pa., 1937
17	PRINCE IGOR		Alexander Borodin	Fokine, Dolinoff	A. Jarin		Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
18	THE PRODIGAL SON	Catherine Littlefield	César Franck	Catherine Littlefield		Lazar Galpern	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
19	ROMANTIC VARIATIONS		Camille Saint-Saëns	Catherine Littlefield		J. Pascal	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936
20	THE SLEEPING BEAUTY		Peter Tchaikowsky	Catherine Littlefield	R. Deshays	Lee Gainsborough	Philadelphia, Pa., 1937
21	THE SNOW QUEEN	after Hans Christian Andersen	Murray Cutter	Catherine Littlefield	A. Jarin	P. T. Champs	Philadelphia, Pa., 1935
22	TERMINAL	Catherine Littlefield	Herbert Kingsley	Catherine Littlefield	Angelo Pinto	Salvatore Pinto	Paris, 1937
23	VIENNESE WALTZ		Johann Strauss	Catherine Littlefield	A. Jarin	P. T. Champs	Philadelphia, Pa., 1936

RUTH PAGE-BENTLEY STONE BALLET AND OTHER COMPANIES

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 ADONIS	Heinrich Heine, Ruth Page	Lehman Engel	Ruth Page		John Pratt	Chicago, Ill., 1944
2 AN AMERICAN PATTERN	Ruth Page, Nicholas Remisoff	Jerome Moross	Ruth Page, Bentley Stone		John Pratt	Chicago, Ill., 1937
3 AMERICANS IN PARIS	Nicholas Remisoff	George Gershwin	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Cincinnati, Ohio, 1936
4 THE BELLS	Edgar Allan Poe, Ruth Page	Darius Milhaud	Ruth Page	Isamu Noguchi	Isamu Noguchi	[Chicago, Ill.] New York, 1946
5 BILLY SUNDAY	Ruth Page, Remi Gassmann Words: Ray Hunt	Remi Gassmann	Ruth Page	Paul DuPont	Paul DuPont	Chicago, Ill., 1946
6 CHOPIN IN OUR TIME	Ruth Page	Frederic Chopin, Owen Haynes	Ruth Page		John Pratt	Chicago, Ill., 1941
7 CINDERELLA	Ruth Page, after Perrault	Marcel Delannoy	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Ravinia, Ill., 1931
8 FAIRY AND JOHNNY	Michael Blandford, Jerome Moross, after popular song	Jerome Moross	Ruth Page, Bentley Stone	Clive Rickabaugh	Paul DuPont	Chicago, Ill., 1938
9 BILLY SUNDAY	Ruth Page, Nicholas Remisoff	Jacques Ibert	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1934

JULIE		ASTORIA		Chicago, Ill., 1933
				Nicholas Remisoff
11 GUNS AND CASTANETS	Ruth Page, after George Bizet, Mimic words: Jerome Moross Garcia Lorca	Ruth Page, Bentley Stone	Clive Rickabaugh	John Pratt	Chicago, Ill., 1939
12 HEAR YE! HEAR YE!	Ruth Page, Nicholas Remisoff	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1934
13 IBERIAN MONOTONE	Maurice Ravel	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Ravina, Ill., 1930
14 LOVE SONG	Ruth Page	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1935
15 OAK STREET BEACH	Nicholas Remisoff	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Ravina, Ill., 1929
16 PAVANE	Ruth Page	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1932
17 LES PETITS RIENS	Ruth Page	Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	Robert Davison	Robert Davison	Chicago, Ill., 1946
18 SCRAPBOOK	Ruth Page	Miscellaneous	Clive Rickabaugh	Pratt, Rickabaugh, Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1939
19 THE STORY OF THE SOLDIER	Igor Stravinsky	Ruth Page, Blake Scott	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1931
20 WALTZ	Ruth Page, Nicholas Remisoff	Ruth Page	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	Chicago, Ill., 1932

11 HÄNSEL AND GRETEL	Ernst Humperdinck	Willam Christensen	Jean de Botton	Jean de Botton	San Francisco, Cal., 1943
12 NOW THE BRIDES	William Christensen	Fritz Berens	Willam Christensen	Charlotte Rider	San Francisco, Cal., 1939
13 OLD VIENNA	Johann Strauss	Willam Christensen	Helen Green	Helen Green	San Francisco, Cal., 1938
14 PYRAMUS AND THISBE	Fritz Berens	Willam Christensen	Russel Hartley	Russel Hartley	San Francisco, Cal., 1945
15 ROMEO AND JULIET	Peter Tchaikowsky	Willam Christensen	Helen Green	Helen Green	San Francisco, Cal., 1938
16 RUMANIAN WEDDING	George Enesco	Willam Christensen	J. C. Taylor	J. C. Taylor	Portland, Ore., 1936
17 SONATA PATHÉTIQUE	Ludwig van Beethoven	Willam Christensen	Cliff Jones	Cliff Jones	San Francisco, Cal., 1943
18 SWAN LAKE	Begitchev and Geltser	Peter Tchaikowsky after Petipa	Eugene Orlovsky, Nicholas Pershin	Charlotte Rider	San Francisco, Cal., 1940
19. THE TRIUMPH OF HOPE	Jean de Botton	César Franck	Willam Christensen	Jean de Botton	San Francisco, Cal., 1944
20 WINTER CARNIVAL	Johann and Josef Strauss	Willam Christensen	Betty Bates, De Mars	Betty Bates, De Mars	San Francisco, Cal., 1942

MORDKIN BALLET

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 DIONYSUS	Mikhail Mordkin	Alexander Glazounov	Mikhail Mordkin	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1938
2 LA FILLE MAL GARDÉE	Jean Dauberval	Johann Wilhelm Hertel	Mikhail Mordkin	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1938
3 GISELLE	Mordkin, after Gautier	Adolphe Adam	Mikhail Mordkin	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1937
4 THE GOLDFISH	Mikhail Mordkin, after Pushkin	Nicolas Tcherepnine	Mikhail Mordkin	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1937
5 SLEEPING BEAUTY	Mordkin, after Petipa	Peter Tchaikowsky	Mikhail Mordkin	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1937
6 SWAN LAKE	Mikhail Mordkin after Petipa	Peter Tchaikowsky	Mikhail Mordkin	Lee Simonson	Lee Simonson	Waterbury, Conn., 1937
7 TRILPAK	Tcherepnine, Mordkin, Soudeikine	Alexandre Tcherepnine	Mikhail Mordkin	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1937
8 VOICES OF SPRING	Mikhail Mordkin	Johann Strauss, Zlatin	Mikhail Mordkin	Lee Simonson	Lee Simonson	New York, 1938

BALLET Russe DE MONTE CARLO

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 ANCIENT RUSSIA	Bronislava Nijinska	Peter Tchaikowsky	Bronislava Nijinska	Nathalie Gontcharova	Nathalie Gontcharova	Cleveland, Ohio, 1943
2 BACCHANALE	Salvador Dali	Richard Wagner	Leonide Massine	Salvador Dali	Salvador Dali	New York, 1939
3 BALLET IMPERIAL		Peter Tchaikowsky	George Balanchine	Mstislav Dobujinsky	Mstislav Dobujinsky	Chicago, Ill., 1944
4 LE BAISER DE LA FÉE	Igor Strawinsky	Peter Tchaikowsky, Igor Strawinsky	George Balanchine	Alice Halicka	Alice Halicka	New York, 1945
5 LE BEAU DANUDE	Leonide Massine	Johann Strauss, Roger Desormière	Leonide Massine	Etienne de Beaumont	Etienne de Beaumont	(Paris), (1924)
6 THE BELLS	Ruth Page, after Edgar Allan Poe	Darius Milhaud	Ruth Page	Isamu Noguchi	Isamu Noguchi	Lee, Mass., 1946
7 BILLY SUNDAY OR GIVING THE DEVIL HIS DUE	Ruth Page, Remi Gassman Text, J. Ray Hunt	Remi Gassman	Ruth Page	Herbert Andrews	Paul Du Pont	New York, 1948
8 BOGATYRI	Leonide Massine	Alexander Borodin	Leonide Massine	Nathalie Gontcharova	Nathalie Gontcharova	New York, 1938
9 LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME	George Balanchine	Richard Strauss	George Balanchine	Eugene Berman	Eugene Berman	New York, 1944
10 LA BOUTIQUE FANTASQUE (Revival)	André Derain	Rossini, Respighi	Leonide Massine	André Derain	André Derain	(London), (1919)

21	LES ELÉMENTS	Johann Sebastian Bach	Michel Fokine	Dimitri Bouchène	Dimitri Bouchène	(London), (1937)
22	LES ELVES	Michel Fokine	Felix Mendelssohn	Christian Bérard	Christian Bérard	(New York), (1924)
23	L'ÉPREUVE D'AMOUR	André Derain, Michel Fokine	Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	André Derain	André Derain	(Monte Carlo), (1936)
24	ETUDE	Johann Sebastian Bach	Bronislava Nijinska	Alexander Borowsky	Alexander Borowsky	Cleveland, Ohio, 1943
25	FRANKIE AND JOINNY	Michael Blandford, Jerome Moross	Jerome Moross	Ruth Page, Bentley Stone	Clive Rickabaugh	Paul Du Pont Kansas City, 1945
26	GITÉ PARISIENNE (Revival)	Etienne de Beaumont	Jacques Offenbach, Manuel Rosenthal	Etienne de Beaumont	Etienne de Beaumont	(Monte Carlo), (1938)
27	GHOST TOWN	Marc Plattoff	Richard Rodgers	Marc Plattoff	Pène Du Bois	Pène Du Bois New York, 1939
28	GISELE	Saint Georges, Gautier	Adolphe Adam	Coralli, Serge Lifar	Alexandre Benois	Alexandre Benois (Paris), (1910)
29	ICARE	Serge Lifar	Lifar, J. E. Szyfer	Serge Lifar	Eugene Berman	Eugene Berman New York, 1937
30	JEU DE CARTES (Revival)	Strawinsky, Malieff	Igor Strawinsky	George Balanchine	Irene Sharaff	Irene Sharaff New York, 1940
31	LABYRINTH	Salvador Dali	Franz Schubert	Leonide Massine	Salvador Dali	Salvador Dali New York, 1941
32	MADROÑOS	Moszkowski, Yradier, etc.	Antonia Cobos	Castillo	Castillo	New York, 1947

45	ST. FRANCIS	Paul Hindemith, Leonide Massine	Jaromir Weinberger	Jaromir Weinberger	Leonide Massine	Oliver Smith	Alvin Colt	New York, 1941
46	SARATOGA				Leonide Massine	Oliver Smith	Alvin Colt	New York, 1941
47	SCHNEIDERZADE (Revival)	Léon Bakst, Michel Fokine	Rimsky- Korsakov	Rimsky- Korsakov	Michel Fokine	Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	(Paris), (1910)
48	SERENADE		Peter Tchaikowsky	Peter Tchaikowsky	George Balanchine	Jean Lurcat	Jean Lurcat	New York, 1935
49	SEVENTH SYMPHONY (Revival)	Leonide Massine	Ludwig van Beethoven	Ludwig van Beethoven	Leonide Massine	Christian Bérard	Christian Bérard	Monte Carlo, 1938
50	THE SNOW MAIDEN	Sergei J. Denham	Alexander Glazounov	Alexander Glazounov	Bronislava Nijinska	Boris Aronson	Boris Aronson	New York, 1942
51	SPECTRE DE LA ROSE (Revival)	J.-L. Vaudoyer, Gautier	Carl Maria von Weber	Carl Maria von Weber	Michel Fokine	Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	(Paris), (1911)
52	SWAN LAKE (Revival)	Begitchev and Geltser	Peter Tchaikowsky	Peter Tchaikowsky	Marius Petipa	A. Schervazhidze	A. Schervazhidze	New York, 1945
53	LES SYMPHES	Michel Fokine	Chopin, Ivan Boutnikoff	Chopin, Ivan Boutnikoff	Michel Fokine	A. Schervazhidze	O. Larose	New York, 1945
54	THE THREE- CORNERED HAT (Revival)	Martinez Sierra	Manuel De Falla	Manuel De Falla	Leonide Massine	Pablo Picasso	Pablo Picasso	(London), (1919)
55	UNION PACIFIC	Archibald MacLeish	Nicholas Nabokov	Nicholas Nabokov	Leonide Massine	Albert Johnson	Irene Sharaff	Philadelphia, Pa., 1934
56	VIENNA—1814	Leonide Massine	Carl Maria von Weber	Carl Maria von Weber	Leonide Massine	Stewart Chaney	Stewart Chaney	New York, 1940
57	VIRGINIA SAMPLER	Valerie Bettis	Leo Smit	Leo Smit	Valerie Bettis	Charles Elson	Charles Elson	New York, 1947

14	DON DOMINGO	Alfonso Reyes	Sylvestre Revueltas	Leonide Massine	Julio Castellanos	Julio Castellanos	Mexico, D.F., 1942
15	FAIR AT SOROCHINSK	Gogol, David Lichine	Modeste Moussorgsky	David Lichine	Nicholas Remisoff	Nicholas Remisoff	New York, 1943
16	FALL RIVER LEGEND	Agnes de Mille	Morton Gould	Agnes de Mille	Oliver Smith	Miles White	New York, 1948
17	FANCY FREE	Jerome Robbins	Leonard Bernstein	Jerome Robbins	Oliver Smith	Kermit Love	New York, 1944
18	LA FILLE MAL GARDÉE (Revival)	Dauberval, Nijnska	Wilhelm Hertel	Bronislava Nijnska	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1940
19	GALA PERFORMANCE (Revival)	Antony Tudor	Serge Prokofieff	Antony Tudor	Nicolas De Molas	Nicolas De Molas	New York, 1941
20	GIFT OF THE MAGI	Simon Semenoff	Lukas Foss	Simon Semenoff	Raoul Pène Du Bois	Raoul Pène Du Bois	New York, 1945
21	GISELLE (Revival)	Théophile Gautier	Adolphe Bolm	Coralli, Anton Dolin	Eugene Berman	Eugene Berman	New York, 1946
22	GOYESCAS	Alden Jenkins	Enrique Granados	Argentina	Nicolas De Molas	Nicolas De Molas	New York, 1940
23	GRAZIANA		Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	John Taras	Alvin Colt	Alvin Colt	New York, 1945
24	THE GREAT AMERICAN GOOF	William Saroyan	Henry Brant	Eugene Loring	Boris Aronson	Boris Aronson	New York, 1940
25	HELEN OF TROY	David Lichine, Antal Dorati	Jacques Offenbach	David Lichine	Marcel Vertès	Marcel Vertès	Mexico, D.F., 1942
26	INTERPLAY		Morton Gould	Jerome Robbins	Oliver Smith	Irene Sharaff	New York, 1945
27	JARDIN AUX LILAS	Antony Tudor	Ernest Chausson	Antony Tudor	Raymond Sovcy	Raymond Sovcy	New York, 1940

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOROGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
28 JUNGLE OF PARIS (Revival)	Hugh Laing	Kurt Weill	Antony Tudor		Lucinda Ballard	New York, 1940
29 LADY INTO FOX (Revival)	Andrée Howard	Arthur Honegger	Andrée Howard	Raymond Sovey	Raymond Sovey	New York, 1940
30 MADAME SELLER: ANGEOR	Charles Lecocq, Leonide Massine	Charles Lecocq	Leonide Massine	Mstislav Dobujinsky	Mstislav Dobujinsky	New York, 1943
31 MECHANICAL BALLER	Adolph Bolm	Alexander Mossolov	Adolph Bolm	John Hambleton	John Hambleton	New York, 1940
32 ONE TO GLORY	Yurek Shabelevsky	Frederic Chopin	Yurek Shabelevsky	Michel Baronov	Michel Baronov	New York, 1940
33 ON STAGE	Mary and Michael Kidd	Norman Dello Joio	Michael Kidd	Oliver Smith	Alvin Colt	New York, 1940
34 PAS DE QUATRE		Cesare Pugni	Keith Lester			New York, 1945
35 LES PATINEURS (Revival)		Meyerbeer, Constant Lambert	Frederick Ashton	Cecil Beaton	after A. E. Chalon	New York, 1946
36 PETER AND THE WOLF	Serge Prokofieff	Serge Prokofieff	Adolph Bolm	Cecil Beaton	Cecil Beaton	New York, 1946
37 PETROUCHKA	Alexandre Benois, Igor Stravinsky	Igor Stravinsky	Adolph Bolm	Lucinda Ballard	Lucinda Ballard	New York, 1940
38 PILLAR OF FIRE	Antony Tudor	Arnold Schoenberg	Michel Fokine	Alexandre Benois	Alexandre Benois	(Paris) (1911)
39 PRINCESS AURORA (Revival)	Peter Tchaikovsky	Petipa, Dolin	Antony Tudor	Jo Mielziner	Jo Mielziner	New York, 1942
				Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	New York, 1941

40	QUINTET	Raymond Scott	Anton Dolin	Lucinda Ballard	Lucinda Ballard	New York, 1940
41	ROMANTIC AGE	Vincenzo Bellini	Anton Dolin	Carlos Mérida	Carlos Mérida	New York, 1942
42	ROMEO AND JULIET	Shakespeare, Tudor	Frederick Déflus	Antony Tudor	Eugene Berman	New York, 1943
43	RUSSIAN SOLDIER	Michel Fokine	Serge Prokofieff	Michel Fokine	Mstislav Dobujinsky	Boston, Mass., 1942
44	SHADOW OF THE WIND	Antony Tudor	Gustav Mahler (Das Lied von der Erde)	Antony Tudor	Jo Mielziner	New York, 1948
45	SLAVONIKA	Vania Psota	Anton Dvorak	Vania Psota	Alvin Colt	New York, 1942
46	SPECTRE DE LA ROSE (Revival)	Vaudoyer, Gautier	Carl Maria von Weber	Michel Fokine	Léon Bakst	(Paris) (1911)
47	SWAN LAKE (Revival)	Begitchew and Geltser	Peter Tchaikowsky	Petipa, Dolin	Lee Simonson	New York, 1941
48	LES SYLPHIDES (Revival)		Frederic Chopin	Michel Fokine	Eugene Dunkel	New York, 1940
49	TALLY-HO	Agnes De Mille	Christoph Willibald Gluck	Agnes De Mille	Motley	New York, 1944
50	THREE VIRGINS AND A DEVIL	Ramon Reed	Ottorino Respighi	Agnes De Mille	Motley	New York, 1941
51	UNDERTOW	Antony Tudor	William Schuman	Antony Tudor	Raymond Breinin	New York, 1945
52	VOICES OF SPRING		Johann Strauss	Mikhail Mordkin	Lee Simonson	(New York) (1938)

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	D'OR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 AURORA'S WEONING		Peter Tchaikowsky	Petipa and Nijnska	Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	Paris, 1922
2 CAIN AND ABEL	David Lichine	Richard Wagner	David Lichine	Miguel Prieto	Miguel Prieto	(New York), 1916
3 CAMILLE	John Taras, after Dumas	Franz Schubert, Vittorio Rieti	John Taras	Cecil Beaton	Cecil Beaton	New York, 1916
4 CARNAVAL	Michel Fokine	Robert Schuman	Michel Fokine	Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	Paris, 1910
5 THE CEIMOS GROVE	Roman Vignoli Barreto	Eduardo Fabini	Vanla Psota	Jacob Anchutín	Jacob Anchutín	Montevideo, 1941
6 CENDRILLON	after Perrault	Frédéric d'Erlanger	Michel Fokine	Nathalie Gontcharova	Nathalie Gontcharova	London, 1938
7 LES CENT BAISERS	Boris Kochno	Frédéric d'Erlanger	Bronislava Nijnska	Jean Hugo	Jean Hugo	Monte Carlo, 1935
8 CHOREARTUM		Johannes Brahms	Leonide Massine	Constantin Tcherechkovitch, Eugene Lourie	Constantin Tcherechkovitch, Eugene Lourie	London, 1933
9 CONSTANTIA		Frederic Chopin, Adolf Schmid	William Dollar	Horace Arncliffe	Grace Houston	New York, 1911
10 L.B. COQ D'OR	Bielsky, Benois	Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tcherepnine	Michel Fokine	Nathalie Gontcharova	Nathalie Gontcharova	Paris, 1914
11 CORILLON	Boris Kochno	Emmanuel Chabrier	George Balanchine	Christian Bérard	Christian Bérard	Monte Carlo, 1932

12	LES DIEUX MENDIANTS	Sobeka	Händel, Thomas Beecham	David Lichine	Léon Bakst	Juan Gris	London, 1928
13	THE ETERNAL STRUGGLE	Igor Schwezoff	Sehmann, Antal Dorati	Igor Schwezoff	Kathleen and Florence Martin	Kathleen and Florence Martin	Sidney (Australia), 1940
14	LES FEMMES DE BONNE HUMEUR	after Goldoni	Domenico Sclarlatti, Fuerst	Leonide Massine	Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	Rome, 1917
15	LE FILS PRODIGE	Boris Kochno	Serge Prokofieff	David Lichine	Georges Rouault	Georges Rouault	Paris, 1929
16	THE FIRE-BIRD	Michel Fokine	Igor Stravinsky	Michel Fokine	Nathalie Gontcharova	Nathalie Gontcharova	Monte Carlo, 1934
17	FRANCESCA DA RIMINI	David Lichine, Henry Clifford	Peter Tchaikowsky	David Lichine	Oliver Messel	Oliver Messel	London, 1937
18	GRADUATION BALL	David Lichine	Johann Strauss, Antal Dorati	David Lichine	Alexandre Benois	Alexandre Benois	Sidney (Australia), 1940
19	ICARE	Serge Lifar	Serge Lifar, Eugene Fuerst	Serge Lifar	Jacob Anchutin	Sidney Nolan	New York, 1937
20	JEUX D'ENFANTS	Boris Kochno	Georges Bizet	Leonide Massine	Joan Miro	Joan Miro	Monte Carlo, 1932
21	MAD TRISTAN	Salvador Dali	Richard Wagner, Boutnikoff	Leonide Massine	Salvador Dali	Salvador Dali	New York, 1944
22	MUTE WIFE	after Anatole France	Paganini	Antonia Cobos	Rico Lebrun	Rico Lebrun	New York, 1944
23	PAGANINI	Rachmaninoff, Fokine	Serge Rachmaninoff	Michel Fokine	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	London, 1939
24	PAGANINI	Michel Fokine	Schumann	Michel Fokine	Michel Fokine	Michel Fokine	New York, 1944

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
26 PETROUCHKA	Benois, Strawinsky	Igor Strawinsky	Michel Fokine	Alexandre Benois	Alexandre Benois	Paris, 1911
27 LES PRÉSAGES	Leonide Massine	Peter Tchaikowsky	Leonide Massine	André Masson	André Masson	Monte Carlo, 1933
28 PRINCE IGOR		Borodine	Michel Fokine	Nicholas Roerich	Nicholas Roerich	Paris, 1909
29 PROTÉE	David Lichine, Henry Clifford	Claude Debussy	David Lichine	Georges de Chirico	Georges de Chirico	London, 1938
30 SCHEHERAZADE	Fokine, Bakst	Rimsky-Korsakov	Michel Fokine	Léon Bakst	Léon Bakst	Paris, 1910
31 SEBASTIAN	Edward Caton	Gian-Carlo Menotti	Edward Caton	Oliver Smith	Milena	New York, 1944
32 SCUOLA DI BALLO	Goldoni, Massine	Boccherini, François	Leonide Massine	Etienne de Beaumont	Etienne de Beaumont	Paris, 1924
33 SWAN LAKE		Peter Tchaikowsky	after Marius Petipa	Constantin Korovine	Constantin Korovine
34 LES SYMPHONES		Frederic Chopin, Ricti	Michel Fokine	A. Schervachidze	O. Larose	New York, 1940
35 SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE	Hector Berlioz	Hector Berlioz	Leonide Massine	Christian Bérard	Christian Bérard	London, 1936
36 AURA	Guicharme de Almeida, Psota	Francisco Mignone	Vania Psota	Candido Portinari	Candido Portinari	Sao Paulo, Brazil,

AMERICAN BALLET CARAVAN

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 AIR AND VARIATIONS		Johann Sebastian Bach	William Dollar		Walter Gifford	Athens, Georgia, 1938
2 BILLY THE KID	Lincoln Kirstein	Aaron Copland	Eugene Loring		Jared French	Chicago, Ill., 1938
3 CHARADE OR THE DEBUTANTE	Lincoln Kirstein	American Melodies, Rittman	Lew Christensen		Alvin Colt	New York, 1939
4 CITY PORTRAIT	Lincoln Kirstein	Henry Brant	Eugene Loring		Forrest Thayer, Jr.	New York, 1939
5 ENCOUNTER		Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	Lew Christensen		Forrest Thayer, Jr.	Bennington, Vt., 1936
6 FILLING STATION	Lincoln Kirstein	Virgil Thomson	Lew Christensen	Paul Cadmus	Paul Cadmus	Hartford, Conn., 1938
7 FOLK DANCE		Emmanuel Chabrier	Douglas Coudy		Charles Rain	Burlington, Vt., 1936
8 HARLEQUIN FOR PRESIDENT	Lincoln Kirstein	Domenico Scarlatti	Eugene Loring		Keith Martin	Bennington, Vt., 1936
9 POCALYPTAS	Lincoln Kirstein	Elliott Carter, Jr.	Lew Christensen		Karl Free	Middleburg, Vt., 1936
10 PROMENADE		Maurice Ravel	William Dollar		after Horace Vernet	Bennington, Vt., 1936
11 SHOW PIECE		Robert McBride	Erick Hawkins		Keith Martin	Bar Harbor, Me., 1937
12 A THOUSAND TIMES NEIGH	Edward Mabley	Tom Bennett	William Dollar	Walter Dorwin Teague	Alvin Colt	New York, 1940
13 YANKEE CLIPPER	Lincoln Kirstein	Paul Bowles	Eugene Loring		Charles Rain	Saybrook, Conn., 1937

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 ALMA MATER	Edward M. Warburg	Kay Swift	George Balanchine		John Held, Jr.	Hartford, Conn., 1934
2 APOLLON MUSAGÈTE (Revival)	George Balanchine	Igor Stravinsky	George Balanchine	Stewart Chaney	Stewart Chaney	New York, 1937
3 BAISER DE LA FÉE (Revival)	Igor Stravinsky	Igor Stravinsky	George Balanchine
4 BALLET IMPERIAL		Peter Tchaikovsky	George Balanchine	Alice Halicka	Alice Halicka	New York, 1937
5 THE CARD PARTY	Igor Stravinsky, M. Malieff	Igor Stravinsky	George Balanchine	Mstislav Dobujinsky	Mstislav Dobujinsky	New York, 1941
6 CHARADE (Revival)	Lincoln Kirstein	Trude Rittmann	George Balanchine	Irene Sharaff	Irene Sharaff	New York, 1937
7 CONCERTO BAROCCO		Johann Sebastian Bach	George Balanchine		Alvin Colt	New York, 1941
8 DREAMS (Revival)	André Derain	George Anthell	George Balanchine	Eugene Berman	Eugene Berman	New York, 1941
9 ERRANTE (Revival)	Pavel Tchelitchew, George Balanchine	Franz Schubert	George Balanchine	André Derain	André Derain	New York, 1935
10 FANTASIA BRASILEIRA		Francisco Mignone.	George Balanchine	Pavel Tchelitchew	Pavel Tchelitchew	New York, 1935
				Enrico Bianco	Enrico Bianco	Lima, Peru, 1941

11	JUKE-BOX	Lincoln Kirstein	Alex Wilder	William Dollar	Tom Lee	Tom Lee	New York, 1941
12	MOZARTIANA (Revival)		Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	George Balanchine	Christian Bérard	Christian Bérard	Hartford, Conn., 1934
13	ORPHEUS	Ranieri De Calzabigi	Christoph Willibald Gluck	George Balanchine	Pavel Tchelitchev	Pavel Tchelitchev	New York, 1936
14	PASTORELA	José Martinez	Paul Bowles	Lew Christensen	Alvin Colt	Alvin Colt	New York, 1941
15	REMINISCENCE	George Balanchine	Benjamin Godard, Henry Brant	George Balanchine	Sergei Soudeikine	Sergei Soudeikine	New York, 1935
16	SERENADE		Peter Tchaikowsky	George Balanchine		Jean Lurgat	Hartford, Conn., 1934
17	TIME-TABLE	Lincoln Kirstein	Aaron Copland	Antony Tudor	James Morcom	James Morcom	New York, 1941
18	TRANSCENDENCE	Lincoln Kirstein	Franz Liszt, George Antheil	George Balanchine	Franklin Watkins	Franklin Watkins	Hartford, Conn., 1934

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 BLACKFACE		Carter Harman	Lew Christensen	Robert Drew	Robert Drew	New York, 1947
2 DIVERSIEMENTO		Alexei Haieff	George Balanchine			New York, 1948
3 THE FOUR TEMPERAMENTS		Paul Hindemith	George Balanchine	Kurt Seligmann	Kurt Seligmann	New York, 1946
4 HIGHLAND FLING	William Dollar	Stanley Rate	William Dollar	David Folkes	David Folkes	New York, 1947
5 THE MINOTAUR	Kirstein, Junyer	Elliot Carter, Jr.	John Taras	Joan Junyer	Joan Junyer	New York, 1947
6 MOTHER GOOSE SUITE		Maurice Ravel	Todd Bolender			New York, 1948
7 ORPHEUS		Igor Stravinsky	George Balanchine	Isamu Noguchi	Isamu Noguchi	New York, 1948
8 PASTORELA (Revival)	José Martinez	Paul Bowles	Lew Christensen	Alvin Colt	Alvin Colt	New York, 1947
9 RENARD (Revival)	Igor Stravinsky	Igor Stravinsky	George Balanchine	Esteban Francés	Esteban Francés	New York, 1947
10 THE SEASONS		John Cage	Merce Cunningham	Isamu Noguchi	Isamu Noguchi	New York, 1947
11 SYMPHONIE CONCERTANTE IN E FLAT		Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart	George Balanchine	James Stewart Morcom	James Stewart Morcom	New York, 1948
12 SYMPHONY IN C		George Bizet	George Balanchine			New York, 1948
13 THE TRIUMPH OF BACCHUS AND ARIADNE		Vittorio Rieti	George Balanchine	Corrado Cagli	Corrado Cagli	New York, 1948
14 ZODIAC		Rudi Revil	Todd Bolender	Esteban Francés	Esteban Francés	New York, 1947

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 BILLY THE KID (Revival)	Lincoln Kirstein	Aaron Copland	Eugene Loring	Jared French	Jared French	New Haven, Conn., 1942
2 CITY PORTRAIT (Revival)	Lincoln Kirstein	Henry Brant	Eugene Loring	Reginald Marsh	Reginald Marsh	New York, 1942
3 THE DUKE OF SACRAMENTO OR HOBBO OF THE HILLS	Eugene Loring	Norman Dello Joio	Eugene Loring	George Bockman	George Bockman	New Hope, Penn., 1942
4 HARLEQUIN FOR PRESIDENT (Revival)		Domenico Scolariatti	Eugene Loring		Keith Martin	Washington, D.C., 1942
5 JINX	Lew Christensen	Benjamin Britten	Lew Christensen	George Bockman	George Bockman	Washington, D.C., 1942
6 THE MAN FROM MIDIAN	Winthrop Palmer	Stefan Wolpe	Eugene Loring	Doris Rosenthal	Doris Rosenthal	Washington, D.C., 1942
7 PRAIRIE	after Carl Sandburg	Norman Dello Joio	Eugene Loring	James Morcom	Felipe Fiocca	Washington, D.C., 1942

BALLET INTERNATIONAL

TITLE	BOOK	MUSIC	CHOREOGRAPHY	DECOR	COSTUMES	PREMIERE
1 BRAHMS VARIATIONS		Johannes Brahms	Bronislava Nijinska	Marcel Vertés	Marcel Vertés	New York, 1944
2 CONSTANTIA		Frederic Chopin	William Dollar	Horace Armistead	Grace Houston	New York, 1944
3 MAD TRISTAN	Salvador Dali	Richard Wagner	Leonide Massine	Salvador Dali	Salvador Dali	New York, 1944
4 MEMOIRS	Winthrop Palmer	Johannes Brahms	Simon Semenov	Raoul Pène Du Bois	Raoul Pène Du Bois	New York, 1944
5 THE MUTE WIFE	after Anatole France	Paganini, Vittorio Ricci	Antonia Cobos	Rico Lebrun	Rico Lebrun	New York, 1944
6 PICTURES AT AN EXHIBITION		Modeste Moussorgsky	Bronislava Nijinska	Boris Aronson	Boris Aronson	New York, 1944
7 PRINCE GONDAR'S FESTIVAL		Anton Rubinstein	Boris Romanoff	Matislav Dobujinsky	Matislav Dobujinsky	New York, 1944
8 FLORENCE	Edward Caton	Gian-Carlo Menotti	Edward Caton	Oliver Smith	Milena	New York, 1944
9 THE GARDEN OF CATHERINE		Paul Bouleaux	André Eglevsky	Salvador Dali	Salvador Dali	New York, 1944
10 THE GARDEN		Peter Tchaikovsky, Catherine	Antonia Vilensk, after Petipa	Eugene Dunkel	Grace Houston	New York, 1944
11 THE GARDEN		Frederic Chopin	Vera Fokina	Eugene Dunkel	Grace Houston	New York, 1944

INDEX

A

AIR AND VARIATIONS, 85, 87, 88
ko, 54, 148
agra, 174
ra Mater, 63, 78
nso, Alicia, XI, XII, 89, 118, 124, 149, 151, 155
arez, Anita, 143
erican Ballet, X, 43, 58, 62, 63, 66, 69, 76, 78, 84, 85, 86, 87, 89, 92, 93, 143, 160, 168
llan Musagète, 33, 59, 60, 62, 81, 84, 89-90, 148
près-midi d'un Faune, 40-41, 43, 118
nitage, Merle, XIV, 30, 45, 84
nson, Boris, 58, 65, 98, 164

B

BCHANALE, 21, 51-53
ser de la Fée, 60, 62, 82-83, 149
anchine, George, X-XII, 38, 39, 40, 49-52, 59, 60-68, 78-83, 85, 87-89, 91-93, 104, 105, 122, 126, 127, 135, 144, 145, 148-150, 159, 168, 174
Bet Associates in America, 153
Bet Caravan, 76, 85, 86, 88, 89, 93, 122, 141, 144, 159, 160, 161
Bet Imperial, 60, 62, 63, 90, 149
Bet International, 53, 87, 88, 153, 159-165
Bet Intime, The, 33, 72
Bet Russe Highlights, 39, 47
Bet Russe de Monte Carlo, XII, 38-45, 121, 122, 147, 149, 153, 154, 163, 164, 166
Bet Society, XI, XII, 64, 75, 76, 77, 87-93, 144, 153
Bets Suédois, Les, 98
Bet Theatre, X-XII, 27, 33-35, 37, 40, 45, 51, 54, 57, 59, 71, 87, 94, 158, 163
Bet Theatre Foundation, 152
Bet Theatre Guild, 152 on Dance, 71
onova, Irina, 40, 43, 68, 146
Basil, Colonel Wassily, 38-40, 42, 43, 45, 154, 157, 165, 166
u Danube, Le, 38, 40, 43
umont, Cyril W., XIII, 103
ls, The, 65, 74-75, 104
ois, Alexandre, 27, 32, 41, 60, 65, 145
ley, Muriel, 101, 126, 129, 137, 155
man, Eugene, 115, 117
nstein, Leonard, 129, 136, 138, 139
tis, Valerie, 57, 66, 104
y the Kid, 55-57, 85, 89, 97, 98, 123, 141, 146, 159-161, 169
hday of the Infanta, The, 32, 72 ck Croak, The, 19-20, 99, 167

Blast at Ballet, 79, 80-81, 93, 121, 148
Bluebeard, 37, 145, 148
Blum, René, 38-40, 58
Bolender, Todd, XII, 57, 65-67, 89, 92, 104, 141
Bolm, Adolph., 22, 30, 32-34, 70, 75, 82, 95, 148
Boris, Ruthanna, XII, 57, 65-68, 124, 141
Bourgeois Gentilhomme, Le, 38, 60, 63
Bontique Fantastique, La, 40, 47, 148

C

CAROUSEL, 170
Carpenter, John Alden, 33, 72
Caton, Edward, 26, 65, 125, 164
Charade, 85, 87, 89
Chase, Lucia, 26, 95, 149, 153, 155-156
Chicago Allied Arts, 33, 72, 75
Chapin Concerto, 58
Christensen, Lew, 82, 85, 86-88, 89, 123, 159, 162
Christensen, William, 50, 69-70
Cirque de Deux, 65, 67
City Portrait, 85, 86, 98, 159, 161-162
Cobos, Antonia, 65, 141, 164, 165
Colt, Alvin, 50, 141, 143
Commedia Balletica, 65, 67
Concerto Barocco, 62, 90, 104, 149, 151
Concurrence, La, 38, 40, 60
Constantia, 88, 166
Copland, Aaron, 55, 56, 85, 89
Catillon, Le, 38, 60
Création du Monde, La, 98
Cuckold's Fair, The, 65 de Cuevas, Marquis George, 117, 157, 163-166
Cunningham, Merce, 92

D

DALI, SALVADOR, 53, 117, 165
Dance Players, 86, 87, 141, 159-163
Danielian, Leon, 68
Danilova, Alexandra, 26, 42, 43, 65, 67
Dances Concertantes, 60, 62, 63, 104, 122, 124, 150
Dark Elegies, 96, 101, 103, 148
Dello Joio, Norman, 141, 142, 160, 161
De Mille, Agnes, XII, XIV, 48, 55, 94-120, 122, 124, 126, 128, 141, 148, 169-174
Denby, Edwin, XIV, 82, 88, 90, 103, 104, 107, 122, 124, 135, 140, 150
Denham, Sergei J., 39, 52, 68, 159
Diaghilev, Serge de, 21, 23-27, 28-38, 40, 45-46, 57, 59, 70, 72, 81, 82, 90, 93, 103, 124, 151, 157

Dim Lustré, 102, 105-107, 110-111, 148
Divertimento, XII, 60, 91, 104
Dolin, Anton, 34, 95, 126, 145, 148-149
Dollar, William, 80, 83, 85, 87-89, 91, 92, 103, 164, 166
Don Domingo, 148
Duncan, Isadora, 21, 24, 78, 109
Dying Swan, 21, 23, 35

E

EGLEVSKY, ANDRÉ, 68, 164, 165, 166
Elsler, Fanny, 16-19
Esen, Viola, 26, 95, 164, 165

F

FACSIMILE, 109, 126, 138-140, 148
Fair at Sorochinsk, 148
Fancy Free, XIV, 89, 124-127, 129-137, 140, 148
Fille Mûr Gardée, La, 26, 96, 148, 156
Filling Station, 85-86, 97
Finian's Rainbow, 143, 173
Firebird, 34, 148
Fleischmann, Julius, 39
Fokine, Michel, IX, 23, 25, 30, 32, 34-37, 39, 40, 42, 45, 46, 57, 58, 59, 63, 66, 67, 69, 75, 93, 95, 96, 103, 108, 120, 129, 143-145, 147, 148, 150, 168
Four Temperaments, The, 60, 91-92
Frankie and Johnny, 65, 73, 75, 97, 123
Franklin, Frederic, 26, 43, 55, 64, 68

G

GALA PERFORMANCE, 109, 114-116, 127, 148
Gerstwin, George, 49, 169
Ghost Town, 45, 55, 65
Gift of the Magi, 148
Gilder, Rosamond, 174
Giselle, 17-18, 21, 23, 24, 26, 43, 73, 95, 118, 145, 148-149, 156
Graham, Martha, 66, 89, 105, 110, 123
Grand Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, 166
Graziara, 143-144, 148
Great American Goofer, The, 55, 95-98, 146, 160

H

HELEN OF TROI, 37, 148
Highland Fling, 92
Hightower, Rosella, 124, 166
Hindemith, Paul, 53, 54, 92
Hoffmann, Gertrude, 29, 168
Hurok, Sol, 39, 40, 41-42, 51, 52, 146-147, 154, 155, 166

I

IMPERIAL RUSSIAN ACADEMY, 30, 35, 41, 59, 74, 104
Imperial Russian Ballet, 21, 24, 28, 30, 41
Interplay, 124, 127-128, 136-138, 148

J

JARDIN AUX LILAS, 66, 96, 101-103, 105, 106, 110, 111, 119, 148
Jeu de Cartes, 62, 83, 149
Jeux d'Enfants, 38, 53
Jinx, 87, 162
Johnson, Edward, 79, 80
Jones, Robert Edmond, 31, 32, 97
Jooss, Kurt, 92
Judgment of Paris, 96, 101, 148, 157
Juke Box, 88, 89

K

KAYE, NORA, 118, 124, 139, 142, 155
Kidd, Michael, 8, 89, 101, 109, 121-144, 148, 159, 173
Kirstein, Lincoln, VIII, XII, XIV, 28, 29, 31, 50, 51, 60, 76-94, 104, 121-123, 125, 149, 151, 153, 157, 159, 161, 165
Kosloff, Theodore, 29, 70, 99
Krazy Kat, 33
Kriza, John, 129, 136, 139, 142, 155

L

LAING, HUGH, 95, 99, 103, 119, 139, 155
Lang, Harold, 69, 129, 136
Le Clercq, Tanaquil, 91
Lee, Mary Ann, 16-20
Lichine, David, 37, 43, 148-150
Lifar, Serge, 40, 58, 126
Littlefield, Catherine, 50, 69-72, 123, 143
Lola Montez, 65
Loring, Eugene, 48, 55-56, 66, 85, 89, 95, 96, 97, 98, 104, 123, 125, 140, 141, 146, 159, 162, 163

M

MAD TRISTAN, 53, 165
Madroños, 65
Markova, Alicia, 26, 34, 43, 68, 118, 146
Markova-Dolin Company, 126
Martin, John, XIV, 88, 95, 97, 104, 106, 110, 112, 122, 137, 139, 158, 160, 162, 169, 174
Massine, Leonide, 25, 26, 30, 36, 38-40, 42, 43, 45-54, 57, 59, 63, 65-67, 93, 123, 126, 148-149, 164, 166
Maywood, Augusta (La Petite Augusta) 15-18, 20
Metropolitan Opera, 25, 29, 32, 42, 52, 72, 80, 81, 84, 87, 141, 147, 154, 168
Minotaur, The, 92, 144
Moncion, Francisco, 91, 164, 165
Mordkin, Mikhail, 21-27, 87, 94-96, 156
Mordkin Ballet, The, 26, 156
Moylan, Mary Ellen, 68, 91, 124
Mute Wife, The, 66, 165, 166

N

NEW YORKER, THE, 45, 47, 49
Nijinska, Bronislava, 40, 58-59, 65, 66, 82, 96, 148, 164, 168

Nijinsky, Vaslav, 23, 24, 30-32, 34-36,
46, 118-120
Nobilissima Visione see St. Francis
Noguchi, Isamu, XI, 74, 92

O

OBEAH (BLACK RITUAL), 95, 98,
146, 148
Oklahoma!, XIV, 100, 169-170, 171-175
On Stage!, 89, 141-143, 148, 153
On your Toes, 168
Original Ballet Russe, 38-39, 42-45, 126, 144, 154-155, 165, 166
Orpheus, XI, XII, 80-82, 168

P

PAGE, RUTH, XII, 30, 50, 57, 65,
69, 72-74, 101, 104, 123
Pas de Trois (Robbins), 126
Pas de Quatre (Dolin), 118, 148-149, 156
Pastorelo, 85, 87, 89
Pavlova, Anna, 21-27, 30, 34, 35, 39,
72, 99, 103
Peter and the Wolf, 34, 95, 148
Petipa, Marius, 28, 65, 82, 83, 93, 104
Petrouchko, 15-34, 38, 42, 43, 56, 58, 83, 145, 147-148, 156
Philadelphia Ballet, 71, 143
Pillar of Fire, 102, 105, 106-111, 118-120, 122, 148, 153, 157
Plages, 38
Platoff, Marc, 55, 125
Pleasant, Richard, 94, 96, 145-146, 156
Pocahontas, 85, 87
Prairie, 160-163
Présages, Les, 40, 53
Prince Igor, 34, 38, 40, 42, 43, 56, 58
Promenade, 35, 87, 88

R

RASCH, ALBERTINA, 167
Raymonda, 65
Red Poppy, The, 65
Reed, Janet, XI, 69, 129, 137, 142-143, 159
Remisoff, Nicholas, 33, 75
Riabouchinska, Tatiana, 40, 43, 68
Robbins, Jerome, XIV, 89, 101, 109,
121-144, 148, 173
Rodeo, 55, 57, 64, 100, 124, 126, 169, 171
Rodgers, Richard, 171
Romeo and Juliet, 69, 99, 107, 115-118, 148, 153
Russian Soldier, 37, 145, 148

S

ST. FRANCIS (NOBILISSIMA VISIONE), 51-54, 66
San Francisco Opera Ballet, 33, 69-70
Saratoga, 45, 47, 50, 64, 124
Sarovay, William, 96-98
Scheherazade, 29, 34, 35, 41, 43, 46,
54, 56, 58, 67, 108, 119, 120, 129,
168
Schoenberg, Arnold, 33, 106, 110

School of American Ballet, 60, 77, 85,
87, 89-90, 93, 143
Scuola di Ballo, 38
Seasons, The, 24, 92
Seligmann, Kurt, 92
Semenoff, Simon, 148, 164
Sentimental Colloquy, 165
Serenade, 62, 78, 80, 89, 104, 149, 150
Shawn, Ted, 123
Slaughter on Tenth Avenue, 168, 174
Sleeping Beauty, The, 71, 156
Smith, Oliver, 50, 55, 56, 129, 136,
138-141, 143, 154, 158
Snow Maiden, 58, 71
Soudeikine, Sergei, 27
Spectre de la Rose, 34, 37, 41, 43, 58, 145, 147
St. Dennis, Ruth, 21, 24, 99
Stone, Bentley, 72
Strawinsky Festival, 81-84
Strawinsky, Igor, XI, 33, 46, 59, 63,
65, 67-73, 83, 84, 90, 92, 145
Summer Day, 126-127
Swan Lake, 24, 26, 43, 67, 69, 73, 95, 119, 145, 146, 148-149
Sylphides, Les, 29, 34-37, 38, 42, 43, 58, 92, 95, 96, 100, 118, 119, 129,
145, 146, 147-148, 149, 150, 156,
164

T

TALLCHIEF, MARIA, XI, 68, 124,
166
Tally-Ho, 98-101, 124, 148, 153, 157
Taras, John, 91, 92, 104, 141, 143,
148, 166
Tchaikowsky, Peter I., 41, 60, 63, 69,
70, 82, 83, 89, 149
Tchelitchev, Pavel, 54, 60, 80, 92
Theme and Variations, 145, 148-150
Thousand Times Neigh, A, 87-89
Three Cornered Hat, The, 40, 47, 52, 148
Three Virgins and a Devil, 93, 99, 148
Toumanova, Tamara, 26, 40, 42, 43, 68
Tricorne, Le, see Three Cornered Hat,
The
Tudor, Antony, XII, 51, 52, 66, 94-
120, 122, 127, 128, 140, 148, 155,
156, 158
Turnbull, Julia, 17-20

U

UNDERTOW, 102, 105, 110-114, 119, 148
Union Pacific, 45, 46-49

V

VIRGINIA SAMPLER, 66, 104

W

WALTZ ACADEMY, 60, 145, 148-149
Warburg, Edward M., 60, 77, 78

Y

YANKEE CLIPPER, 85
Youskevitch, Igor, XI, 26, 68, 150

